EDITOR'S FOREWORD

IN format and general scope of contents, this edition of the YEAR BOOK substantially follows the lines of the previous edition. Certain major changes have, however, been made in respect of the hospital directory sections and the analysis of bed figures. For the present edition it was decided to present a fuller analysis of bed figures based upon the classification of beds used in the annual statistical returns required to be made by hospital authorities to the Ministry of Health, and also to give figures of out-patient, etc., work.

To do this it has been necessary to recast the hospital directory sections relating to national health service hospitals in England and Wales and in Scotland. Whereas in the previous edition these sections were of a composite character, the former details of bed complement being given side by side with the other information relating to the hospitals, they have now been divided into two parts. Sections 4, 5 and 6 of the present edition provide a directory of the national health service hospital authorities and their hospitals on lines similar to the previous edition but giving only a total of beds for each hospital, together with a general indication of the nature of the hospital (i.e. whether general, maternity, infectious diseases, etc.), and the analysis of bed figures, together with patient statistics, is now given separately in a new section (section 8). Only in this way was it possible to provide the fuller bed analysis and the additional patient statistics, and while it is appreciated that some disadvantage may be felt in this separation of information, an endeavour has been made to offset this by giving cross references from the relevant directory section to the statistical one, and also by differentiating references to them in the indexes to hospitals and hospital authorities.

In respect of the bed and patient statistics given in section 8 it is a matter of regret that it has not been possible to provide the information given for Scottish hospitals on exactly the same basis as that for England and Wales. This arises from the fact that for Scotland there are no comparable annual statistical returns to those required from hospital authorities in England and Wales.

Notwithstanding these differences in the statistical information presented for Scotland as compared with England and Wales, it is hoped that the changes made and the provision of the more comprehensive information now given in respect of beds and patients will be regarded as improvements, adding to the value of the YEAR BOOK as a work of reference. One result has inevitably been to add to the bulk of the volume. Another has more unfortunately been to delay the publication of the present edition, whose original production schedule was in the first place adversely affected by the London printing trade dispute of last winter. Despite that dispute much of the present edition was seen through the press by the end of 1950, but unexpected difficulties were encountered in preparing the hospital directories and bed and patient statistics for press. These arose less from the extent of work involved in their preparation, although in itself considerable, than from the many discrepancies which were found within statistical returns and between returns received direct from hospital authorities and information obtained through the central departments, this although the latter information was supplied to the departments by the same authorities. It is hoped that in future these difficulties may be obviated and publication on a regular annual schedule resumed.

In respect of the remainder of the YEAR BOOK the scope and content of the various sections correspond to those of the previous edition. Opportunity has been taken to include the summarised accounts of the hospital boards and committees in section 9, although at the time this section went to press only the accounts relating to 1948-49 were available. While it is anticipated that these accounts, together with the summarised parliamentary estimates of hospital expenditure, will continue to be included in the YEAR BOOK, the limitations to their usefulness are also appreciated. The extent, however, to which financial statistics on a wider scale are included in the YEAR BOOK must depend on what is done in this connection by the central departments. Even if more detailed figures of hospital accounts should become available for publication, it would serve no useful purpose merely to duplicate in the YEAR BOOK what was published elsewhere in a readily available form.

This editorial note would again not be complete without an expression of my grateful appreciation to those officers of the Ministry of Health and the Department of Health for Scotland who so readily afforded their assistance and co-operation in making available information for this volume. My thanks are no less due to the officers of the Ministry of Pensions and other Government departments, the Regional Hospital Boards, Boards of Governors, Hospital Management Committees, Boards of Management, the Northern Ireland Hospitals and Tuberculosis Authorities, and those of the many other bodies and organisations who have equally readily supplied information.

THE HOSPITAL SERVICE
Some Current Problems

BY THE EDITOR

NOTWITHSTANDING the controversy with which its inception was surrounded the actual launching of the National Health Service—the changeover from the old to the new on July 5th, 1948—was accomplished remarkably smoothly. Changes of the magnitude involved, notably in the administration of the hospital service, might well have been accompanied by considerable confusion and breakdown of services. Behind the scenes there was indeed some disorder, but so far as the patient and the public generally were concerned the vast operation of transferring some 3,000 hospitals to a new ownership and placing them under a completely new administration took place with singularly little disturbance. That, indeed, it succeeded in launching itself comparatively so smoothly constituted an initial achievement of the new hospital service.

If, however, its initial launching was accomplished with success the hospital service from the first found itself confronted with tremendous difficulties. The Hospital Surveys of 1942-44 made all too clear the vast deficiencies of the hitherto existing services. Although conditions varied in detail from one area to another the surveys showed with devastating clarity the uneven distribution of existing resources, including specialist skill, a general shortage of hospital accommodation, notably for maternity and tuberculosis, the poor quality of much existing accommodation and equipment, and of the provision made in particular for the chronic sick. By 1948 there was added the further lee-way of building resulting from the war, and in addition the new service found itself faced also with serious shortages of nursing, domestic and other categories of staff, while at the same time its establishment had the effect of increasing the demand for hospital facilities.

It is against this background, which is all too often forgotten, that the progress of the national service since 1948 must be viewed. Inevitably the progress has not been spectacular. The task of remedying the gross quantitative and qualitative inequalities, shortages and deficiencies inherited in 1948 would have been difficult enough had large scale capital development been possible. Such development has in fact been ruled out, and the service has perforce had to proceed from the first on a basis of " make-do and mend."

Shortage of Staff and Beds

Continued improvements in nurses' salaries and other conditions of service have been accompanied by a further increase of nursing and midwifery staff. By June 30th, 1950 the number of such staff totalled 160,000 (comprising 135,000 full-time and 25,000 part-time staff), and represented an increase of 24,000 (16,000 full-time and 8,000 part-time) as compared with July 5th, 1948. In the same period the number of student nurses increased by some 7,000 to a record total of 49,000. At the same time efforts to narrow the shortage of domestic staff have also continued, and as a general result of increased staff and other measures some 15,000 more hospital beds were staffed and in use at June 30th, 1950 than at July 5th, 1948.

Despite this increase in the number of available beds and other steps taken to meet special needs, such as the utilisation of former infectious diseases accommodation for tuberculosis, it remains that hospital provision still falls far short of the demand for it. What in terms of beds is the gap between existing provision and demand there is at present no exact means of assessing, but it would be no more than a cautious estimate to suggest that, excluding consideration of accommodation for mental cases, the figure is not less than 75,000 beds. While the extent of the shortage of hospital provision may thus be expressed in terms of beds, it must be emphasised that the problem is not merely one of provision of accommodation and equipment but also of securing increased numbers of doctors, nurses, and other staff. Without these the provision of additional accommodation would avail nothing, and without them there is in fact existing accommodation which cannot be brought into use.

In this situation the over-riding problem which continues to confront the hospital service is that of getting the best use out of available resources and of effecting, in particular, a saving in the use of acute beds. The problem in itself is not new but it has assumed greater urgency and proportions in a nationalised service.

At the same time the establishment of the national service has brought with it means of securing the more effective use and distribution of facilities. Thus the grouping of hospitals and the establishment of regional planning authorities have among other things made it possible to secure a better distribution of medical and trained nursing staff, to concentrate accommodation for particular types of case in larger and more economic units, and to divert accommodation from less to more urgent uses. Centralised control or oversight of admissions and discharges, normally on a group basis but for certain types of case, such as tuberculosis, on a regional basis, has also been made possible, and this and the development of bed-bureaux have done a good deal to eliminate the anomaly of empty beds at one hospital while there is a long waiting list for beds of the same type at a neighbouring institution.

A more balanced distribution of nurses as between one hospital and another has enabled more beds to be brought into use. Another means to the same end lies in economy in the use of trained nurses, as by the increased use of ward helps and orderlies, elimination of time-wasting procedures and the better planning of wards and services. While there has been progress in this direction, more particularly in the increased use of ward helps and orderlies, there is need for a great deal more to be done, including the application of some of the techniques of job-analysis and time and motion study used in industry. In a situation in which there is a steady increase in the proportion of old people in the population, and therefore of potential patients, and a corresponding decrease in the numbers of young people, and therefore of potential nurses, the hospital service remains unduly complacent about its supply and its use of nurses. It is true that much is being done to attract recruits and retain them in the service, but the same amount of study and effort is not yet being given to the problem of using the nurse when trained to the optimum advantage.

Saving Hospital Beds

A development to the end of saving in the use of acute beds lies in the provision of hostels for ambulant patients, such as have been established at Liverpool for patients attending the Liverpool Radium Institute for X-ray treatment, and at Pinderfields Hospital, Wakefield, for diabetic patients requiring a period of careful dietary supervision and education. There must be limits to the extent to which simpler accommodation of a hostel type can be substituted for that of the hospital ward, but offering as it does a means of saving acute beds, nursing staff, and maintenance costs there is clearly scope for a greater development of such accommodation for certain classes of patients.

To the end of saving beds measures that enable the patient to be kept out of hospital are obviously of paramount importance. In this respect the first line services are the preventive health services of the local health authorities and the general practitioner service, but within the hospital itself the out-patient department offers an increasingly important agency to the same end. As Dr. C. T. Maitland has stressed, the greater use of out-patient departments for diagnosis and treatment "promises economy in both nursing staff and buildings, whilst at the same time quickening the tempo of treatment and avoiding the disadvantages of hospitalisation to the patient".

Developments in diagnostic techniques and methods of treatment, coupled with shortages of beds and the increased demand for medical investigation and treatment, especially at an earlier stage of treatment, have greatly stimulated the development of out-patient departments and given a new orientation to their work—a process which has accelerated under the national service. No longer simply the hospital's jug and bottle department, the extent and range of the out-patient department's work have in fact so increased that the traditional concept of the hospital as an essentially residential establishment is more and more being replaced by one that sees it as a medical consultative centre supported by beds.

In the past two years much has been done in various hospital groups to improve and extend out-patient facilities, and the extent, indeed, to which many out-patient departments have been transferred and a new standard of amenities and service for the patient provided constitutes one of the more notable achievements of the new service. At the same time the development has not been even, and generally speaking it may be said that the organisation and administration of the out-patient department in its rôle of a consultative, diagnostic and treatment centre merit more serious attention than they have yet received.

In this connection the recent report of the sub-committee of the Scottish Standing Advisory Committee on Hospital and Specialist Services which investigated the organisation of out-patient facilities represents a notable contribution on the subject. The report deals with the functions, construction design and location of the out-patient department, and among other things stresses the need for adequate medical staffing, including the services of specialists, the ready availability of diagnostic and therapeutic facilities, the availability also of almoners' services, the provision of adequate ancillary accommodation, and the elimination of unnecessary waiting by the operation of an appointments system.

The Problem of Tuberculosis

Among specific problems of hospital provision that of tuberculosis has continued to be the most pressing. Measures taken to meet the problem include the provision of beds in general hospitals and their annexes, the adaptation of accommodation formerly devoted to infectious diseases hospitals, and the centralised oversight of admissions to tuberculosis hospitals, such as has been arranged by the Liverpool Regional Board. As a result of such measures some 2,260 new beds have been opened and 1,270 re-opened since July, 1948, 1,140 of the total of these additional beds being provided in the last six months of 1950. At the same time nursing staff has also been increasing, some 850 additional nurses (of which 705 were full-time) being recruited to sanatoria and tuberculosis hospitals in the year ending September 30th, 1950.

This increase in beds and nursing staff has been reflected in a fall in the waiting list of those requiring in-patient treatment, the waiting list figure dropping from 11,000 to 10,400 during 1950. During 1950 there was also a further decrease in tuberculosis mortality, which may be attributed partly to increased services and partly to new methods of treatment, such as streptomycin, and there was also, for the first time for several years, a decrease in the notifications of new cases.

Satisfactory, however, as it is thus to be able to record some improvement in the situation, tuberculosis remains a health problem of the first magnitude. The number of beds needed for respiratory tuberculosis is generally estimated at not less than one bed for every thousand of the population, giving a present deficiency of about 20,000 beds, but there are still some 3,500 empty beds and the immediate need is therefore for staff rather than buildings. Staffing is handicapped by the isolated situation of many sanatoria, which has in turn had some effect in isolating sanatoria from the general nurse training schools. An even greater deterrent to recruitment, however, undoubtedly lies in the popular misunderstanding as to the infective nature of the disease, and campaigns to recruit more nurses for tuberculosis institutions must be accompanied by propaganda to remove such misunderstanding.

The increased provision of hospital facilities for in-patient treatment is but one aspect of the tuberculosis problem. There is no less need for the planned development of chest clinics, linked to the general hospitals, and for the co-ordination of the work of clinic and hospital with that of the general practitioner and the local health authorities. The new national service has brought considerable benefits by ending the isolation of tuberculosis treatment from the main stream of general hospital and specialist services, but much remains to be done to solve the administrative problem which it has also brought with it of the division of responsibility for the diagnostic and curative work at the hospital or clinic and the preventive and care measures in the patient's home.

This dichotomy of responsibility is not an insuperable difficulty, but if a real assault is to be made on the problem of tuberculosis both hospital and local authorities, and perhaps above all, the central authority, must display a far great sense of urgency than has yet been apparent. Tuberculosis is not the only field in which diagnostic skill and facilities have outstripped the means of providing treatment, or in which administrative problems of division of responsibility have to be overcome, but it is the one in which such problems bulk largest at the present time, and the cost to the community in terms of human suffering and wastage is great. The fact that it is an economic and social problem as well as a medical one adds to the difficulties of its solution, but should be no reason why those in the health service should not rouse themselves to a more determined effort to curb a disease which has attained proportions constituting a reproach to any modern community.

Provision for the Elderly Sick

Another acute problem of hospital provision is that relating to the care and treatment of the elderly sick. For the hospital service the problem has two facets — the need on the one hand to make adequate provision for the reception and treatment of old people, and the need on the other to avoid the blocking of large numbers of acute beds by the chronic sick. Shortage of beds and of nurses, coupled with the rising proportion of old people in the population renders the problem the more acute, and it is further aggravated by the insufficiency of other forms of care and assistance for the old. The problem of the elderly sick is in fact but one aspect of the general problem of the care of old people in the community, requiring for its solution the adequate provision of domestic accommodation and assistance, including home help and home nursing, and the provision of residential homes of various types, as well as the geriatric service of the hospital.

Within the hospital service an immediate requirement has been to deal with those patients in chronic sick wards who have been only too truly described as "derelict" — old people originally sent to hospital and remaining there not because they require treatment but because they have had nowhere else to go, and have deteriorated through inactivity, and others who have remained confined to bed because they have never received the skilled medical and nursing attention to put them on their feet again. A first task of the national service has, therefore, been the investigation and proper classification of these cases, coupled with the development of an active geriatric service.

As to the nature of such a service there is general agreement that its main functions should be to provide for the thorough investigation of all patients on admission for treatment, and for a course of rehabilitation before discharge. While the geriatric service must be a specialist service based on the acute hospital, an essential to it is the provision of adequate accommodation of appropriate type for the reception of patients no longer in need of or capable of benefiting from active hospital treatment but who are not fit to be discharged to their own homes or those provided by local authorities.

Elderly people suffering from mental infirmity offer a special problem, and there is urgent need to abolish the situation whereby persons afflicted only with mental infirmities arising from old age are certified in order to obtain their admission to a mental hospital in the absence of anywhere else for them to go. For such cases the Ministry of Health has in the past year recommended the development of short-stay psychiatric units, with the functions of diagnosis and short-term treatment, and of long-term annexes, linked to hospitals, where accommodation of a simple and homelike character should be provided for patients whose mental condition is not subject to improvement, but who have no marked behaviour disorders.

Active steps to develop geriatric policies on the foregoing lines have been taken in the areas of most regional boards, but of necessity, in present circumstances of financial restriction and shortage of accommodation and staffing, progress in the provision of new facilities has been slow. In this situation the importance of preventing old people from deteriorating to the point where hospital admission becomes necessary —through the provision of home help, nursing and medical treatment, the latter provided by general practitioners, but acting where necessary in conjunction with out-patient and domiciliary specialist services — becomes the greater.

Co-ordination of Services

The problems of tuberculosis and the care of the elderly sick emphasise the need for close and effective co-operation between the three component arms of the national health service—the hospital, local health authority, and general medical services. The National Health Service Act itself makes little provision for securing co-ordination of the work of the three arms, and recognising this the central departments at an early stage made various suggestions for securing administrative liaison and co-ordination of services, particularly in respect of tuberculosis, maternity and child welfare and mental health. These included suggestions for the joint appointment of medical staff, joint arrangements for the use of health visitors, psychiatric and other medico-social workers, the co-option of medical practitioners and representatives of hospital authorities and executive councils upon local health authority committees, and the setting up of committees by regional boards to provide liaison with local authorities.

To greater or less degree some steps in these directions have been made, and various other measures have also been initiated. At Bradford, for example, the committee of the chest hospital and the care and after-care committee of the local health authority sit together. In Glasgow a health services co-ordinating committee has been set up, representative of the regional hospital board, the local executive council and the health and welfare committee of the Glasgow corporation. A more extensive form of machinery has been established in the South Western region of England where the region has been divided into "clinical areas", each with a joint advisory liaison committee, dealing, among other things, with Part III services under the 1946 Act as they affect both hospital management committees and the local health authorities.

Developments of such kind do not, however, appear to be characteristic of the country as a whole. On the contrary it seems all too clear that much more usually there is a lamentable lack of liaison and therefore of a proper integration of medical services—a state of affairs which is no less detrimental to the general development of the health service than it is to the immediate care and treatment of the patient.

There is then need for a much better co-ordination and integration of services than at present exist, and if this is to be achieved something more than casual contacts and a certain measure of cross-representation on authorities is necessary. Some form of joint advisory machinery, operating in zones within each hospital region, would seem to be indicated, and while the most pressing need for such machinery exists in respect of the co-ordination of hospital and local authority services, difficulties such as those which have arisen over the change of use of hospitals emphasise the need also for such machinery to extend to liaison with the local medical committees representative of the general practitioner. It will no doubt be objected that there are already enough committees of one sort and another in existence in the health services, all making demands on the time of busy people. While the health service has certainly its quota of committees, and no one would wish to add unnecessarily to their number, it may be suggested that what one area can do another can also. In any event health services exist for the patient, not for those who operate them, and at the present time, in the absence of some adequate machinery of co-operation, services for the patient are suffering.

It is not, however, only the institution of some definite machinery for consultative and administrative liaison that is required. Effective co-operation is as much dependent upon the attitude of mind of those concerned as upon any formal machinery of liaison. In this respect the service begins on a bad foundation. The hospital service has always tended to restrict its vision to its own four walls, and the other sections of the service may be similarly indicted. Until the sights are raised we shall continue to have one health service on the statute book and three separate services in practice.

Hospital Finance

For 1950-51 expenditure on the hospital services is estimated at £270 million, out of a total health service expenditure of £392 million, and the size of this amount and the fact that expenditure has much exceeded estimates made before the initiation of the national service have inevitably focussed attention upon the cost of the service.

In considering the present level of hospital expenditure it must be stressed that the expenditure to date under the national service has essentially been directed to maintaining the service as it was taken over in 1948. Only in a most limited way has a start been made towards rectifying all those things which in large measure constituted the raison d'être of a national service, and to which reference has been made earlier in this article—the maldistribution of resources, the uneven quality of services, deficiencies in accommodation and equipment, outmoded and unsuitable buildings and so on. The day cannot be indefinitely delayed when new buildings and re-equipping on a substantial scale must be undertaken. If it may seem unrealistic in present circumstances to talk of such development it is no less unrealistic not to face the fact that a substantial part of the hospital services of this country are provided in buildings which ten years ago were condemned as totally unfit to be used as hospitals—in Wales, for example, nearly one-half of all hospital accommodation was so condemned. Whether viewed from a medical and social standpoint or simply as a matter of economics the indefinite postponement of replacing outmoded and outworn buildings and equipment cannot but be regarded as unsound, and if the problem is not to become completely intractable a start must be made at an early stage on at least a moderate scale.

Leaving aside any question of capital development and looking only at maintenance expenditure there are at least three factors which suggest that, saving a restriction of services to the patient, expenditure must further rise rather than decrease. There is, first, the continuing increase of demand for hospital facilities—a demand which is not merely for increased facilities, but also for improved facilities (including, for example, improved catering), a further factor affecting costs. Since over a wide sector of provision demand for hospital facilities is created rather that satisfied by the provision of improved and extended facilities, this demand for increased hospital provision must be expected to continue until such time as there is a wide-scale development of health centres and a new orientation of general medical practice. Secondly, the cost of hospital supplies, in common with other commodities, has risen sharply and seems bound to rise still further. Thirdly, substantial as has been the rise in the hospitals' salaries bill, it remains that overdue adjustments in the salaries of various professional and medical ancillary workers have yet to take place. Revision of their salary scales has been delayed by the wage-freeze, but cannot be indefinitely postponed, and aside from the special case of these workers it is obvious that as the cost of living rises there must be increasing pressure for a general upward revision of wages and salaries of all categories of hospital staff. Demands, in fact, for such revision are already being made.

Against the background of these factors it is evident that it is more than problematical whether hospital services can be maintained at their present level within the limits of the existing budget for the service, while at the same time it becomes the more imperative that everything possible—consistent with a proper development of services for the patient—should be done to keep maintenance costs down.

It is, however, easier to say this than to point to substantial means of achieving economies. Among the more obvious fields for examination is that of supplies and equipment, where such an example as that of one hospital group achieving a saving of some £2,000 per annum by daily buying of foodstuffs direct at the market, and the often wide variations in the price paid by different hospital authorities for individual items of equipment, indicate that the best value for money is not everywhere being obtained. Central purchase on a national scale provides an answer for a limited range of supplies. In respect of other items there is scope for more efficient group purchase and some development also of arrangements for joint group purchase. In another direction a more economic provision of services could be achieved in some groups by closer integration of services and better functional utilisation of existing buildings, equipment and staff. Again, it cannot be doubted that in respect of administrative and ancillary staff some hospital groups appear to be relatively more heavily staffed than others, and in at least a few groups there would seem to have been a building up of staff at the centre without a comparable diminution at the periphery.

While these offer some directions in which savings can be envisaged the difficulties of the problem are well illustrated by looking at the breakdown of hospital costs. The following is the picture shown by an analysis of the main components of hospital maintenance costs in Scotland for 1949-50:—

	Per cent. of Total
1. COSTS ATTRIBUTABLE TO PATIENTS
Patients' food	9.8
Patients' clothing and laundry	3.1
Drugs, dressings, surgical appliances, etc.	6.1	19.0
2. COSTS ATTRIBUTABLE TO BUILDINGS
Maintenance of buildings and grounds	2.7
Domestic repairs and replacements	6.0
Fuel, light and power ..	8.2	16.9
3. MISCELLANEOUS
Administration, transport, travelling, amenities, trading services, rent and rates, etc.		4.9
4. COSTS ATTRIBUTABLE TO STAFF
Staff food, laundry and uniforms	4.5
Salaries and wages—
Junior medical staff ..	2.3
Nursing staff	28.8
Administrative staff ..	4.3
Other staff	19.3	59.2
TOTAL		100.0

Although the figure given in this analysis for expenditure on administrative staff salaries does not take into account expenditure on Board of Management administration it does include the salaries of matrons, assistant matrons, medical superintendents and assistant medical superintendents as well as staff solely concerned with administrative and clerical work. Even when account is taken of Regional Board and Board of Management administrative costs it is clear that administrative staff salaries—contrary to the many wild assertions of huge savings which could be made in this direction—offer but the minutest scope for savings. On the other hand the analysis makes equally clear that staff salaries and wages as a whole are by far the largest component of the running costs of the hospital service, amounting to roughly 55 per cent. of the whole, a figure which holds good for England and Wales as well as Scotland.

Investigation of Staffing

This high proportion of hospital expenditure which consists of salaries and wages has naturally directed attention to the possibilities of exercising closer control over staff establishments, and to this end a development of the past year in England and Wales has been the sending out of investigating teams by the Ministry of Health to review and fix the establishment of each hospital authority. The review has in the first instance covered the establishments of medical and dental staffs; nursing and domestic staffs of hospitals; administrative and clerical staffs of boards of governors, management committees and their hospitals; and the headquarters staff of regional boards; the establishment of each of these groups of staff being reviewed by a series of separate teams consisting each of two members.

To the extent that possibilities of economy in the use of staff exist they must obviously be closely pursued, but it must be questioned whether an attempt to review and fix establishments on the lines now being pursued will justify the time and money spent on it. Large as is the salaries and wages bill the overwhelming portion of it is accounted for by doctors, nurses, domestics and other categories of staff who, far from being in such excess as to permit of any reduction in their numbers, are in acutely short supply. The review cannot therefore be expected to effect any but the most minor pruning in overall staffing. The possibilities of its doing anything more than this are further lessened by the manner in which it is being conducted, with separate teams of investigators dealing with the different categories of staff and each team of but two people spending a matter of a few hours at each hospital group. There are no accepted standards of hospital staffing and the investigators have, therefore, only their own—and as between different teams, varying—opinions to guide them. When further it is remembered that hospitals vary greatly one from another—in the character of their work and specialties, in their size, age, construction, physical layout, equipment and so on—it is difficult to believe that the investigation and discussion of the staffing requirements of each authority and its hospitals can be of such character as either to result in any fundamental changes in the distribution or utilisation of staff where such need may exist, or to justify an irrevocable fixing of establishments.

The Ministry would have done much better to have attempted instead some form of organisation and methods investigation, concentrating in the first instance on a number of selected hospital authorities. This would have entailed the root and branch investigation of the whole of the authority's activities, followed by recommendations for improvements to secure greater economy and efficiency. A series of investigations of such type would also carry the promise of providing data upon which certain basic standards of staffing might be formulated.

Cost Accounting

While it must thus be doubted if the present expenditure of the hospital service offers—without a curtailment of services—a field for substantial savings to the taxpayer, it must also be said that the service at present does not possess the means whereby valid financial comparisons may readily be made between one unit and another. During the past year a new uniform system of what was officially termed cost accounting has been introduced "as an interim measure". The system, however, constitutes no more than a simple subjective analysis of expenditure based on an extension of the heads of expenditure previously required for financial returns to the Ministry, and while its introduction may be welcomed as a means of securing a uniform analysis of expenditure throughout the service, it is not in reality a system of cost accounting. It is in fact merely a refinement of the former Revised Uniform System of Accounts which, dating back for some fifty years, had even before the last war been found wanting. Such a system does not enable proper comparisons to be made between the work and costs of one hospital and another, and to this end—and therefore towards that of securing effective financial control—there is urgent need for the introduction of objective, or departmental, cost accounting. Although extremely cautious in its attitude to this question the Ministry of Health seems at least to have recognised the need for some form of departmental costing by requesting the King Edward's Hospital Fund and the Nuffield Provincial Hospitals Trust to carry out an investigation into such costing.

The System of Financial Control

The introduction of a system of departmental costing would provide one aid towards placing the internal economy of the hospital service on a sound footing. Another pressing need is for a change in the general system of financial control. The original concept of administrative and financial control underlying the National Health Service Act of 1946 was one of centralised financial responsibility and decentralised administration at the periphery through a machinery of global budgets. This concept was later reiterated by the then Minister of Health in 1949 in the following terms :—

> "As I understand and envisage the operation of the administration of the hospital system of the future, it will go something like this: we shall have global budgets determined for the regional hospital boards and the management committees of hospitals. . . . Within those global budgets the management committees will have discretion to spend what they wish on this or that item of administration. If they spend more on one, they spend less on another."

Earlier, in the first Ministry circular relating to the new service (R.H.B. (47)1), a similar emphasis on devolution of administrative responsibility was expressed as follows :—

> "The Act contemplates (sections 11 and 12) that the Minister will discharge most of this duty through Regional Hospital Boards. The Boards will act as the Minister's agents—but agents on whom he wishes to confer the largest possible measure of discretion. Powers of central control, through regulations and directions, are reserved in the Act because of the Minister's ultimate responsibility. It would, however, be quite alien to his intention that these powers should be used for any detailed or meticulous control of the Board's activities. The Minister wants the Boards to feel from the outset, although acting as his agents, a lively sense of independent responsibility."

From the very start of the service, however, it became clear that far from any absence of "detailed or meticulous control" and the granting of any real financial freedom within the bounds of a global budget, a close and detailed control was to be exercised all the way down the line by the central department. Thus, inter alia, the financial regulations of 1948 decreed that the annual estimates of hospital management committees, under eight sub-heads of expenditure, had to be directly approved not by the regional boards but by the Ministry, and once approved management committees could not except with sanction of the regional board use savings under one head of expenditure for another purpose, while neither boards nor management committees could carry forward any surpluses from one year to another.

The rigidity of this system of control was modified for the estimates for 1950-51, the Ministry approving instead one global sum for each region, delegating the approval of management committee estimates to the regional boards, and allowing regional boards to hold back some of the global sum as a regional reserve to meet unforeseen contingencies. This was at least a step towards the original conception of global budgets, but in the past year, for reasons best known to the Ministry, and certainly not because it resulted in difficulties for regions or management committees or in extravagant spending, this limited step forwards has been more than retracted. Not merely has the Ministry in respect of the 1951-52 estimates taken back the delegation of approval of the detailed estimates of management committees, but it has also taken from the regional boards the power of sanctioning the use of savings under one head for use under another and reserved this power of virement to itself.

At the same time bureaucracy has been carried to extreme lengths by two further measures. To the ostensible end of ensuring that hospital expenditure is kept within the approved estimates management committees are now required to prepare monthly statements of expenditure and send these to the regional board and to the Ministry. The regional board—

> "is to examine the statements sent to them by Management Committees each month, make such inquiries and give such direction as may be necessary to reduce the rate of expenditure, and within fourteen days of the receipt of each statement report to the Minister on any case in which it appears that there is a danger of exceeding the approved estimate and on the steps taken to prevent this happening."

Contemporaneously the Ministry ordained that "for liaison purposes" arrangements should be made for the principal regional officers of the Ministry, or their deputies, to be kept informed of the proceedings of boards and committees by receiving regularly copies of the agendas, papers and minutes of all their meetings and by attending such meetings as they thought desirable.

Aside from the lack of confidence in the hospital boards and committees which these measures betray, it is difficult to believe that the sending of some 400 monthly returns of expenditure to the Ministry serves any useful purpose other than to inflate the salaries and wages expenditure of the Ministry, hospital authorities and post office. It is no less difficult to believe that without a similar inflation the regional offices of the Ministry can scrutinise the agendas, minutes and other papers of anything up to fifty or more authorities, still less attend the meetings of these bodies.

The absurdity of all this needs no stress. We have, in short, reached the stage in the hospital service where one series of authorities is set up to administer the service and another is being created to watch that they do it. Instead of the original concept of decentralised administration there has been set up an attempted system of controls, reports, cross-checks, inspection and surveillance quite alien to it.

It is time that instead of panic expedients and the creation of a strait-jacket of controls and prohibitions the hospital service got back to—or more accurately, began to work on—the principles upon which its administration was contemplated in the framing of the Act. That means a system of financial control based on global budgets and the devolution of a responsible measure of financial autonomy within the bounds of a global budget, to hospital management committees. This would afford a far more powerful incentive to efficiency and economy on the part of committees than results from the present network of imposed controls. Under the present system there is no encouragement to management committees to concern themselves with economy and efficient financial administration. While they cannot freely use savings under one head for another purpose and are not allowed to carry forward any surpluses from one year to another it is inevitable that they should adopt the negative attitude of spending all they get under each and every head, and that in submitting estimates should pitch their demands as high as possible and not budget realistically since there is no other way of securing a reserve margin.

Public accountability in the hospital service there must be, but public accountability includes responsibility for ensuring that the best value is obtained for money as well as mere checking that money spent falls within authorised bounds. The present system does not afford a sound basis of economy, a first essential of which is a real sense of financial responsibility on the part of the local spending authorities. If, as is commonly objected, it is not possible under the present system of governmental finance to allow hospital authorities to carry forward savings from one year to another, should that system not be examined with a view to any necessary modification rather than accept that it must be our master and dictate to us—irrespective of good or evil—the form in which the service must be administered ?

This and the suggestion of financing the service on the basis of quinquennial grants—which among other things would eliminate many serious difficulties which arise from the present budgeting time-table—are no doubt heretical to the Treasury and the Accountant-General's department, but so too, compared with anything in the past, is the administrative framework of the new service. If that framework and the concept of decentralised responsibility for administration is to be maintained the traditional view of regarding the finance and administration of a public service as separate entities must be abandoned. As "The Lancet" has put it, "as things stand to-day, the administrative framework of the hospital part of the Act, and the financial machinery being used to implement it, do not fit together ; and one or the other will ultimately have to give way".[1]

Standards of Administration

It is in the nature of a truism to say that the quality of the hospital service as a whole depends largely on the quality of the administration within it, and not least at the level of the individual hospital. Despite the attempt to regard administration and finance as separate entities, financial stringency and the need for economy, in its proper meaning of securing the best value from available resources, have in fact emphasised that the two cannot be separated—that if the function of administration has widened since Florence Nightingale described it as the general discipline and control of expenditure, the pursuit of economy in the sense above indicated is an integral and basic function of administration. In present circumstances, therefore, the part played by the administrator becomes the more vital to the successful development of the service.

If, however, the administrator is to play his part successfully he must be properly equipped for his job, which means that besides requisite qualities of mind—and of heart—he must have the training, knowledge, and experience appropriate to his job. Over the past two decades or more the Institute of Hospital Administrators, with the goodwill and co-operation of the government departments and employing authorities, has done much, through its summer schools, refresher courses, and the work of its regional organisations, as well as through its professional examinations, to raise standards of administration and to secure recognition of hospital administration as a specialised form of administration calling for its own training and qualification. Its success in the latter respect is reflected in the now general demand that candidates for appointment to senior hospital administrative posts should hold appropriate professional qualifications, and this in turn finds reflection in the number of students now registered for the Institute's examinations, which, amounting to some 2,000 is strikingly high in relation to the administrative staffing of the service.

Notwithstanding the progress which has thus been made it is clear that the standard of administration is not everywhere what it should be, and that towards resolving this there is need of two developments. The first is for more systematic recruitment to the service, accompanied by minimum entrance standards of education. Recruitment so far to the hospital administrative and clerical service has been largely haphazard, but with the majority of entrants coming in at school leaving age and without being required to have any minimum standard of educational attainment. If the service is not to lag behind others it must endeavour to recruit a higher standard of school-leaving entrant and must also be prepared to recruit from the universities, providing a regulated means of entry for an appropriate number of university graduates. The extent, however, to which the service will attract the right kind of entrant at all levels of entry obviously is dependent upon the prospects which it offers. In this respect there is considerable scope for improvements if the service is to compete on equal terms with others, and the level of remuneration which at present applies to one particular post—that of administrator of the individual hospital, in many respects the most vital in the hospital administrative service—provides not merely a discouragement to recruitment but an immediate threat to the efficiency of the service.

[1] "The Lancet," 20th May, 1950.

The second need is for the extension of practical administrative training within the hospital. At the present time a number of individual hospitals have schemes for such training. Most, if not all, however are related to recruitment and the training of new entrants, and there is need for developing a general scheme of training, probably at selected local units, for officers of requisite ability, already holding posts in the service, designed to fit them for promotion to senior appointments. One is glad to learn that this subject of administrative training is one to which the Staff Side of the Administrative and Clerical Staffs Whitley Council is giving its attention.

Meanwhile a notable development in this field is the establishment by King Edward's Hospital Fund, with the co-operation of the Institute of Hospital Administrators, of a Staff College in London for hospital administrators. In addition to providing short monthly refresher courses and longer two-year courses in hospital administration for officers drawn as far as possible from within the service, the College is intended to afford a centre also for the continuous study of the problems and practice of hospital administration, and a common meeting ground for all those engaged in the service: chairmen and members of boards and committees, administrators, doctors, nurses, and others. The potentialities of this new venture are clearly great, and, to echo the words of Sir Wilson Jameson, wisely conducted it cannot but do much to raise the standard of hospital administration in this country.

Staff Relations

If good administration is essential to the efficiency and proper development of the service good staff relations are no less important. A comprehensive Whitley machinery has been established for the service and by comparison with other Whitley machinery it may be said to be functioning not unsatisfactorily. The machinery is not, however, yet complete. An essential element of Whitley machinery is provision for recourse to arbitration in the event of failure to reach agreement, and nearly three years after the initiation of the health service machinery an arbitration agreement still remains to be negotiated.

A second serious defect of the Whitley machine is the continued absence of disputes machinery for dealing with cases of dismissal whether on disciplinary or other grounds. This is particularly unfortunate because of its implications in respect of an officer's security of tenure and prospects in the service, which in turn react upon his work. Security of tenure during good behaviour has, indeed, not yet been achieved in the hospital service. There have been too many cases during these early years of officers being given notice of dismissal without warning, without any specific charges being made against them, and without any opportunity of a hearing to appeal against the action taken. A proper code of procedure for disciplinary cases is urgently required.

In April, 1950, the General Whitley Council issued its agreement on hospital joint consultative committees, and in the ensuing months hospitals have been engaged in getting these committees into operation. In the past staff relationships have varied from one hospital to another, extreme paternalism having been the order of the day in one place, complete indifference in another. In recent years several factors have tended to prepare the way for a comprehensive system of joint consultation, among them the inauguration of the national service, manpower shortage, and the work of the Whitley Councils in associating staffs more directly with the running of the service as a whole.

The constitution worked out by the General Council contains a comprehensive statement of functions, and quite rightly stresses the positive aspect of the work of the committee in giving staffs "a wider interest in and a greater responsibility for the conditions under which their work is performed". The effect upon the welfare of the patients of good staff relationships is also recognised. The Whitley Council has also done well to base its scheme upon the individual hospital, and to make clear the intention that there should be consultative committees in all hospitals, except where the small number of staff makes such a committee inappropriate.

There still remains much controversy about the value of joint consultation, and the results of this establishment of consultative machinery throughout a public service will be awaited with interest not only by those within, but also by many outside the service. Its success or otherwise will be dependent upon proper appreciation by staff and management of both its potentialities and its limitations, and above all upon its acceptance by management. It will not be enough for managements simply to accept the committees as vehicles for the communication and discussion of staff problems. They must accept the committees as an integral part of administration, meaning that without abdicating their function of management they must be prepared to bring problems of management to the committees for the staffs' observations no less than the staff bring staff problems. It is in this respect that joint consultation, if it is to be successfully established in the hospital service, will call for something of a radical change of thought on the part of management authorities and their senior officers.

Conclusion

In the foregoing reference has been made to some of the current problems facing the hospital service. A great many others could be cited. What, however, should be clear is that while much is being done towards building up an effective, unified hospital service, the task is one of complexity and magnitude, and the service has still many difficulties to overcome and problems to solve. To this end there is need for greater flexibility in administration and a more forceful and imaginative approach generally to the solution of problems. There is, too, need for more authoritative guidance on the main lines of policy, such as is not at present being afforded either by the Central Health Services Council or by the central authority itself.

National Morbidity Statistics from Hospitals

By R. M. BLAIKLEY
of the General Register Office

As long as seventy-five years ago Dr. William Farr wrote in one of his periodic letters to the Registrar-General :—

> " The thing to aim at ultimately is a Return of the cases of sickness in the civil population as complete as is now procured from the army in England. It will be an invaluable contribution to therapeutics as well as to hygiene ; for it will enable the therapeutist to determine the duration and the fatality of all forms of disease under the several existing systems of treatment in the various sanitary and social conditions of the people. Illusions will be dispelled ; quackery as completely as astrology suppressed ; a science of therapeutics created ; suffering diminished ; life shielded from many dangers."

The purpose behind the collection of morbidity statistics to-day can hardly be better expressed.

Only recently have serious steps been taken towards fulfilling Farr's aim and mortality statistics have remained the main source of information about the extent and incidence of many diseases. The purpose and value of morbidity statistics have for a long time been well recognised by those who are responsible for the health of the people, but the practical difficulties in their collection and compilation have too often been sufficient excuse for doing little about it. Morbidity statistics must be compiled for some years before they can so much as throw any new light on the causation or treatment of disease and more years must elapse before their claim of assisting in the prevention or cure of illness can be substantiated by results ; the enthusiasm and persistence required for their continuance may well be exhausted in the interval. Furthermore, the very extensiveness of the field and the sheer bulk of the data which might be collected are enough to intimidate any who are not sure of their objective. A third problem has been that of classifying disease satisfactorily over the whole range of its manifestations so that a consistent and uniform interpretation could be given to statements about particular diseases ; this problem, which by itself demanded intensive work by men with great experience of the nature of different diseases and the terms used to describe them, has only been overcome in the last few years.

The result has been that, until recently, statistics collected about sickness have been limited in their scope ; those collected by general practitioners and hospitals, whether working alone or in groups, have been restricted to the not very clearly defined areas which they serve, while those derived from notifications of infectious diseases or registration of cancer cases, have by their nature been limited to the incidence of particular diseases. Nevertheless, the information obtained from enquiries carried out in these and other ways has been of sufficient value to indicate what might be achieved by comparing the incidence of disease in one area with its incidence in another or its incidence in the whole country and by setting the amount of sickness caused by individual diseases in its due perspective in relation to other diseases.

As in many other fields of research and investigation, the impact of war gave an impetus towards overcoming the difficulties in the way of collecting national morbidity statistics. The health of the nation in general and the use made of hospital services in particular were of vital importance, but a standard classification of diseases was an essential preliminary to the collection of information on these subjects. A committee of experts was, therefore, asked to prepare a classification of diseases which could be generally used and "A Provisional Classification of Diseases and Injuries for use in compiling Morbidity Statistics," published as a special report of the Medical Research Council, was the product of their work. The experience gained from the use of this classification in the United Kingdom and other classifications abroad made it possible for the first time to incorporate a classification of diseases and injuries with the international classification of causes of death which was being reviewed in 1947 and 1948. The combined classification was adopted by the World Health Organisation in 1948 for international use from the beginning of 1950, and has been published as "The International Statistical Classification of Diseases, Injuries, and Causes of Death." This classification is now used in this country and many others for all official statistics of mortality and morbidity.

Thus, one of the main deterrents to the collection of national morbidity statistics was removed, but the intimidating effect of delayed fruitfulness and the vastness of the field remain to be faced in the work which is now being done. There has, however, been an increasing appreciation, particularly in hospitals, that good records are not a mere luxury for the delight of statisticians, but are essential for the good treatment of patients. There has, therefore, been a development of systematic record keeping which not only supplies basic raw material begging to be examined, but also overcomes a large part of the cost which has always stood in the way of collecting hospital statistics on a national scale. On the strength of these developments it became possible during the war to classify for purposes of statistical analysis every fifth record out of one and a quarter millions relating to patients admitted to Emergency Medical Service hospitals in Britain during the years 1940 to 1946. This showed that a national assault in the field of hospital statistics was practicable provided that an appropriate form containing the necessary information about the patient and the final diagnosis of the condition causing admission could be introduced. Forms were devised and two further enquiries in the field of morbidity statistics relating to hospital patients were launched in 1949, one covering in-patients of a sample of general hospitals, the other, of a more detailed character, covering patients admitted to mental hospitals and mental deficiency institutions.

General Hospital Enquiry

The enquiry based on the records of the Emergency Medical Service hospitals showed that a plan for collecting national statistics of illness causing admission to hospital was practicable, but the state of transition of the hospital service after the war and following the introduction of the National Health Service made it almost impossible to devise immediately a scheme for collecting information about a representative sample of hospital patients throughout the country. However, it was essential with the introduction of the National Health Service that national information about the diseases causing admission to hospital in different areas and in relation to the length of stay in hospital should be collected and the Chief Medical Officer of the Ministry of Health asked a working party to design a suitable form as an essential preliminary to the collection of such information. If hospital records were kept in a uniform way throughout the country, the design of such a form would have been a relatively simple matter, but records are not kept in a uniform way and it was not thought that uniformity should be imposed. The form was, therefore, planned to obtain the minimum amount of information which was essential for the enquiry so that it could normally be completed from the information available on the front sheet of the case notes by a records clerk, subject to the supervision of a doctor in relation to details of diagnosis. The draft form was tried out in four hospitals and, after being modified as a result of the trial, it was decided that it should be used in a fuller enquiry to start in January, 1949.

The form which was adopted is divided into three parts :—

Part 1 contains information about the hospital, sufficient information about the patient to identify re-admissions, and information about sex, civil state, age, and occupation of the patient. This part also includes information about the length of stay in the hospital concerned and particulars of any hospital from which the patient may have been transferred.

Part 2, details for which are to be supplied by a doctor, provides for statements of the final diagnosis of the principal disease or injury which led to admission, complications of this disease, and important accessory conditions.

Part 3, which relates only to deaths, provides for a copy of the cause of death exactly as entered on the medical certificate of cause of death.

Forms are completed for patients who are discharged from, or who die in, hospital after having passed one or more nights in an in-patient bed. The completed forms relating to patients discharged during each month are sent to the General Register Office during the following month and the information is there coded for transfer on to punched cards which are used for mechanical tabulation. The forms are used solely for preparation of statistics and are destroyed after the tables to be derived from them have been completed.

Associated with the general enquiry based on the information obtained in Parts 1, 2 and 3 of the form it is intended to carry out from time to time more detailed enquiries into subjects of special interest. The back of the form will be used for this purpose. An enquiry of this kind into the causes of accidents was started at the same time as the main enquiry and hospitals are supplying additional information on the back of the form for all patients admitted who are suffering from injury or poisoning. The information is designed to give more detail about how, when and where the accident happened as well as the nature of the injury and part of the body affected. For road accidents information is also obtained about the type of road user injured, i.e. pedestrian, pedal cyclist, etc., the types of vehicle involved, and the nature of the collision or other factor which caused the accident. Great interest has been shown recently in the prevention of accidents, particularly those occurring in the home and on the roads. Although much information has already been collected about the causes of such accidents, the new information derived from this enquiry, particularly on the relation between the external causes of accidents and the nature of the injuries suffered, should throw new light on the subject which is needed for making further progress in prevention.

Although the fuller enquiry could not in the early stages relate to a representative sample of patients, it was essential that it should cover all parts of the country and the simplest way of doing this was to bring in all the teaching hospitals. In addition it was desirable in order to obtain information on which an extension of the enquiry could be based to cover one or two areas in detail ; all hospitals in Leicestershire and in Manchester were, therefore, also invited to take part. Dr. Percy Stocks, Chief Medical Statistician of the General Register Office, personally visited most of the hospitals concerned in the autumn of 1948 to explain the purpose of the enquiry and to discuss difficulties with those who would be concerned in it at the hospitals. This vital contact secured the wholehearted co-operation of the hospitals and ensured a smooth start to the enquiry. Further steps were taken with the purpose of providing for correct completion of the forms by arranging a series of courses which were held in the General Register Office during the first half of 1949. The courses were concerned with the objects of morbidity statistics, the use of the Hospital In-patient Summary Form, and the use of the International Statistical Classification of Diseases, Injuries and Causes of Death and were attended by records officers from most of the hospitals taking part in the enquiry. The personal contacts thus established between the General Register Office and the hospitals have been invaluable and have provided the means whereby full co-operation and interchange of views have been maintained. The enquiry will be extended as soon as possible to cover the whole country, possibly on a sampling basis ; it will be modified when necessary better to meet already existing needs, to meet new needs which may arise, and to overcome difficulties encountered in its operation. Close contact between the hospitals and the General Register Office is obviously essential both for discovering such needs and difficulties and for adapting the scheme to meet them.

The statistical tables prepared from the hospital in-patient summary forms, which will be published, are designed to show relationship between diagnosis, duration of stay and the other factors about which information is being collected and the way in which such relationships may vary in different parts of the country. It is by indicating the points where more detailed study is required that the general enquiry will prove its worth and it is for regional bureaux and individual hospitals to follow up the general enquiry by intensive study at the points which appear likely to yield a dividend in better health or more effective treatment.

Mental Health Enquiry

For many years the Board of Control have collected statistics from mental hospitals and mental deficiency institutions as a guide to policy and treatment. In 1947, the Board decided that fuller statistics, particularly in relation to the causes of mental disorder and mental deficiency, should be collected to assist in assessing more fully the value of preventive measures and of different methods of treatment. They therefore approached the General Register Office as the Department possessing both expert knowledge of medical statistics and an organisation for carrying out large-scale statistical compilation. Consideration was given to the form of return to be used, its relation to the records to be maintained in the hospitals and institutions, the arrangements for transmission of record cards to the General Register Office, and the form of the tabulations to be produced. Agreement was reached on these matters and record cards have been submitted to the General Register Office for all patients who have been admitted to, who have left, or who have died in, a mental hospital or institution for defectives since 1st January, 1949. Records for patients who were admitted before 1st January, 1949, and did not leave before 1st January, 1950, have also been obtained so that information about all patients who were inmates of a mental hospital or institution for defectives at the end of 1949 is available.

There are two forms of card, one used for mental disorder, the other for mental deficiency, but the format of the cards is very similar. The cards have two parts. Part A, which is completed when the patient is admitted, contains information about the patient's sex, age, home address, marital state, religion, occupation, and diagnosis, together with administrative details about the type of admission and some further demographic and genetical information. Part B, which is completed on discharge, removal, transfer or death, contains information about the length of stay, outcome and disposal, and diagnosis on leaving as well as the certified cause of death if the patient has died. For patients who were resident throughout 1949, minimal information was collected on " long-stay slips " giving sex, age, home address, marital state and diagnosis.

There is a close link between the record card sent to the General Register Office and the record system within the hospital or institution ; in fact three cards in the same form, but of different colours are completed for each patient. A yellow card is intended for use as the front page of the patient's clinical sheet. Pink and white cards are completed from the yellow card, the pink cards being retained as an index within the hospital arranged in the following assortments :—

Assortment A contains cards of patients who have been inmates of the hospital for less than a year and who have not left or died.

Assortment B contains cards of patients who have been inmates of the hospital for a year or more and who have not left or died.

Assortment D contains the cards of patients who have died when on the hospital's books during the current calendar year.

Assortment E contains the cards of patients who have left or died in earlier calendar years.

Assortments A and B thus contain the cards of all the hospital's inmates and they remain fairly constant in size. Cards remain in Assortments C and D for only a year or less and are transferred at the end of each calendar year to Assortment E which thus increases in size each year.

The white index cards are used for transmission of information to the General Register Office. When Part A has been completed for a new admission the cards are filed in monthly batches which are sent to the General Register Office when complete. The information is there coded for transferring to the punched machine cards which are used in mechanical tabulation. The index cards are returned to the hospitals where they are retained until the patient leaves or dies. Part B is then completed and the card is filed in its monthly batch of leavers, which is kept separate from admissions, and sent to the General Register Office when complete. The information is coded and transferred to machine cards and these index cards, completed in both parts, are retained at the General Register Office until tabulation is completed. They are then destroyed.

Statistical tables are being published in the Registrar-General's Annual Statistical Reviews and the Annual Reports of the Chief Medical Officer of the Ministry of Health. The greater number of the tables relate to the information collected on admission and are designed to show :

(a) the relation between diagnosis and sex, age, marital condition and occupation in different parts of the country ;

(b) the relation between consanguinity of parents and mental health ;

(c) the relation between mental health and family circumstances such as number of sibs or number of children.

The tables relating to information collected on leaving or at death are designed to show :

(a) the relation between diagnosis, duration of stay and disposal in different regions ;

(b) changes of diagnosis ;

Those relating to "long stay" patients are designed to show :

(a) the relation between diagnosis, age and duration of stay to date ;

(b) the relation between duration of stay, age and marital state.

In addition tables required for purely administrative purposes are being prepared. As a result of this enquiry it should be possible to obtain a clearer picture than has been possible in the past of the work which is being done by the mental hospitals and institutions for defectives and a firmer statistical basis for research work.

The Plan of Hospital Statistics in World Health and National Health

The World Health Organisation has demonstrated its keen desire to secure the improvement of hospital statistics throughout the world by adopting the report of the second session of its Expert Committee on Health Statistics. The parts of this report relating to hospital statistics were based on the report of a sub-committee set up specifically to consider the question. The sub-committee recommended action to encourage the compilation of hospital morbidity statistics in suitable countries on lines very similar to those followed in the two enquiries in this country, but they also considered that further study was necessary on two of the main problems which at present impose a limit on the value of such statistics—the need for uniform definition of the terms used and the difficulty of bridging the gap between hospital statistics and statistics representative of the community from which the patients of the hospital are drawn.

It is important that these two problems should be overcome within this country so that morbidity statistics derived from different sources may be fully comparable. Until enquiries into hospital-treated sickness can be related to enquiries into total morbidity whether in general or from particular diseases, full value can be derived from none of them. Hospital enquiries cannot alone fulfil Farr's aim of a complete return of the cases of sickness in the civil population. They complete one part of the picture of sickness in the country; other enquiries and investigations complete different parts or show different aspects of the picture. The aim must be to draw them all together to make a composite but complete picture from which the real burden of sickness in the country can be assessed and on the basis of which plans for reducing the burden can be surely founded.

The Development of British Standards in the National Health Service

By A. F. B. NALL, A.M.I.San.E., A.M.Inst.W.
Assistant Technical Director, B. S. I.

The Meaning of " Standards " and " Standardisation "

THE earliest standards were concerned with weight, mensuration and time, together with standards of value in the form of coinage. This group sufficed until the industrial revolution created conditions producing the need for the standards movement as it exists to-day. Even so, national standardisation, under the aegis of a central authority, is only 50 years old, as it was in 1901 that the Engineering Standards Committee was set up by the four professional institutions most closely concerned. This led to the formation of the British Engineering Standards Association, which in turn became, due to expansion in the work it was requested to undertake, the British Standards Institution. The movement in this country was the forerunner of all standards movements oversea and formed the pattern upon which the majority were modelled.

The fact that standardisation developed from the unification of the size of articles having a common purpose has led some people to interpret the term in this narrow sense even to-day. The late Director of the B.S.I., Mr. Percy Good, C.B.E., defined the modern conception of the term by indicating that " standards are required to enable the properties of a material or article which are significant to be assessed in comparable terms " and amplifying this by stating that :

" to set up a standard of quality, fitness for purpose or performance, it is necessary to start with the answer to the question. What is the material or article required to do ? (and, quite often) What must it not do ? . . . An ideal standard will include requirements in terms of those mechanical, physical and chemical properties which can be assessed objectively. In our present state of knowledge, however, standards often have to include requirements which can only be assessed subjectively, but research is steadily providing the necessary data to enable requirements to be expressed with precision."

The principles implicit in these statements guide the work of the committees of the B.S.I. and it should be clear that " standardisation " should be interpreted in this much wider connotation.

Another misunderstanding sometimes encountered relates to the actual preparation of British Standards. Contrary to some views, the B.S.I. has no existence outside that of its committees and does not produce standards as the result of its own volition. Policy in regard to the various industries served is entrusted to some fifty-five or so industry standards committees, all of which are representative of the community of interest, i.e. producer, user and professional, affected by their work. These committees decide whether or not the preparation of a standard shall be undertaken in a particular case and are guided by three main principles :

(a) that it shall meet a generally recognised want ;

(b) that the interest of both producer and user shall be considered ;

(c) that periodic review shall be undertaken.

The industry standards committees are responsible for the appointment of the technical committees that actually draft the standards ; the latter must, in turn, be fully representative, and all committees are charged with securing the greatest measure of common agreement.

The authoritative status of the committees is reinforced by the practice of circulating draft British Standards to all interested organisations for technical comment and review. In most cases, 600 to 1,000 or more copies of a draft may be issued in this way. Drafts dealing with hospital equipment, for example, are sent to every regional board, management committee and board of governors in the N.H.S. and to many " disclaimed " hospitals, as well as to the many professional organisations concerned. All comments are collated and circulated to the relevant drafting committee, which then reconsiders the draft in the light of them. In this way, the ultimate standard is based not only on the views of a representative body, but reflects a wide cross-section of opinion throughout the country.

When it is realised that British Standards are not, in themselves, mandatory it will be seen that this fully democratic method of controlling the work is essential to success. If the standards are to secure general adoption on a voluntary basis, they must clearly command general support.

In this connection, a committee set up by the Minister of Supply, Mr. G. R. Strauss, under the chairmanship of Sir Ernest Lemon, to examine the question of standardisation in the engineering industry, carefully considered the question of procedure by common consent and reported in 1949 as follows:

> ". . . we agree that national standards can best be evolved by the co-operative action of manufacturers and users, centred in the B.S.I."

Certification Mark Schemes

A development arising from the existence of standards of quality or of performance is the use of certification marks. These schemes permit traders licensed to do so to apply an appropriate mark to articles complying with particular British Standards. The mark enables the manufacturer to be identified and informs the purchaser that the article has been made in accordance with the relevant standard under an approved system of manufacture and quality control.

Marking systems are governed by the Trade Marks Act, which requires that the owner of a certification mark shall be an authorised non-trading organisation. The B.S.I. schemes are administered through the medium of its Mark Committee. In general, the application of certification marking in conjunction with a particular British Standard is voluntarily undertaken (the only exceptions being cases where public health or safety is concerned) and licences are issued after the works of the applicant and his methods of manufacture have been inspected and approved. The marked products of licensees are subjected to periodic checks, by visits to factories and by purchase; the quality control systems of the licensees are also periodically reviewed. In most cases, the services of independent inspecting and testing authorities are employed for this work.

This development is related to the study of sampling, the scientific application of which enables the owner of a certification mark to give an assurance that the bulk represented by the sample conforms to requirements. It is a noteworthy example of manufacturing industry, at some trouble and expense to itself, providing the buying community with a very useful means of identifying quality.

Position of the Hospitals

The Hospital Equipment Standards Advisory Committee of the B.S.I. was appointed in January, 1947. This step followed an approach to the Institution by the British Hospitals Association, in collaboration with the Ministry of Health, towards the end of 1946. The problem was that of a very large number of independent users, together with many more who were grouped under the control of different local authority organisations, requiring considerable amounts of equipment for similar applications. The vast majority of these units had very definite ideas about the types of equipment purchased, and these ideas showed wide variations from one to another. As an added complexity, the larger units were sub-divided into professional groups whose views regarding equipment were not always identical. After full consideration of the best means of dealing with the problem, the B.S.I. General Council decided to recommend that an advisory committee be set up, the members to be drawn from all sections of the hospital profession. This committee would be charged with reviewing the requirements, co-ordinating them wherever possible, and recommending the establishment of British Standards in suitable cases. An inaugural conference representative of all interested organisations was arranged and unanimously adopted the General Council's proposals.

The advisory committee was accordingly appointed. The number and status of the organisations nominating representatives were such as to make it completely authoritative, as will be seen from the following list :—

Admiralty.
Air Ministry.
Association of Hospital Matrons.
Association of Hospital and Welfare Administrators.
Association of Municipal Corporations.

The work was, in several respects, different from that previously undertaken by the B.S.I., although the cardinal principle of procedure by consent was maintained. It was necessary to establish the best means of approaching the many subjects brought under review. The range of equipment bought by hospitals is, of course, extremely wide and contains within it a large number of very complex items. The Advisory Committee decided at the outset that a catalogue of hospital equipment was required so that items needing attention could be readily identified. A sub-committee was set up for this purpose and at once tackled its onerous task with exemplary zeal.

It was decided to set up other sub-committees to deal with groups of related subjects. The sub-committees were asked to report their findings at appropriate intervals for ratification by the full Advisory Committee. Amongst these subordinate groups, the heaviest load was undoubtedly taken by that dealing with hospitals beds and ward equipment. Its members have consistently applied themselves to the work, despite the increasing demands of their official vocations.

Other early decisions were that drugs and food should be excluded from consideration as they were dealt with in other places. It was also agreed that, initially, attention should not be given to items of a structural nature, e.g. building components.

Inaugural Work of the Advisory Committee

During the period from its formation until June, 1948, steady progress was made in dealing with the initial programme. The first report of the committee was published on the expiry of this period as P.D.794 (now out of print). It recorded that sub-committees had been set up to deal with the following subjects :—

Reference catalogue, beds and ward equipment, rubber products, crockery, brooms and brushes, laboratory equipment, b.p. washers.

In respect of the following items, agreed recommendations had been passed to technical committees for attention :—

General-purpose ward beds, children's beds, children's cots, adults' cots, M.H. beds, rubber sheeting, rubber gloves (four types), rubber tubing (four types), air rings, rubber aprons (four types), hot water bottles, rubber footwear, overlay mattresses, air beds, ice bags, finger stalls.

Other items, including maternity cots, over-bed tables, ward screens and positional beds had received preliminary consideration.

This was a commendable achievement and augured well for the future of the work.

Effect of the N.H.S.

The middle of 1948 brought a major change into the hospital world and this was reflected, in varying ways, in the Advisory Committee's work. The principal effects were originally twofold: all members were fully occupied in dealing with the developments arising in their own vocations; several members changed their places of work. These factors made it difficult to secure well-attended meetings.

Other problems arose from the fact that technical committees were by then being called together to examine the agreed recommendations in order to prepare draft standards. These committees were, of course, composed of representatives of the hospitals authorities and of the manufacturers. In many cases, the former organisations nominated the same representatives to serve in both spheres. There were obvious advantages in such a course, but it had the effect of devolving a heavy load upon them at a time when they were already fully committed. In consequence, the tempo of the work as a whole had to be retarded pending the completion of the reorganisation within the profession.

The necessity for the division of the work into the two-stage approach, i.e. advisory committee and technical committee, was not at first appreciated by many representatives. It was not always realised that the first stage was a pre-requisite of the second if the users were to take full advantage of the forum provided by the Advisory Committee. Consequently, when the stage of drafting a standard was reached, members who had already taken part in the earlier deliberations sometimes regarded the proceedings as unnecessarily tortuous and elaborate. This indicated a need for some adjustment in the technique and the opportunity afforded by the slowing down of the work was utilised to examine the possibilities of simplifying the procedure.

A good deal of time was also spent in the office in building up a hospitals mailing list so that information regarding the work of the Institution in this field could be disseminated to all concerned.

Secondary Developments

The experience gained in the initial period showed that a good deal of the committee members' time and effort could be saved if the office undertook some of the preliminary enquiries.

Accordingly, consideration of a new subject was initiated by an interchange of views in committee, with the object of determining the broad lines of approach. Subsequently, B.S.I. staff members visited various hospitals to examine typical examples of the equipment in use and to discuss them with the hospital staffs. The introductory discussion thus served a dual purpose; not only did it "clear the air" for the committee, but it meant that the staff representatives knew a good deal of what to look for when making their visits.

Having, in this way, established what a number of hospitals were using in a particular case, and having recorded their experiences, this information was made the subject of a report to the committee concerned. Such reports formed the basis upon which the further investigations proceeded; when these had been concluded, the staff could then draft a complete set of recommendations from the record of the discussions and place this before the committee for consideration.

This technique can, in suitable cases, greatly reduce the number of occasions upon which it is necessary for a committee to consider a particular item. In fact, in certain instances, it has been possible to table a draft set of recommendations as the result of the initial discussions and the staff enquiries.

On the other hand, there are many pieces of equipment for which the only suitable approach is repeated examination in committee, to enable members to make their own enquiries and report back.

Other subjects necessitate the appointment of small panels which can make a detailed study of a problem and table a full report. Even so, the approach already outlined can be, and has been, used to supplement their work.

In many cases, committees have made corporate investigations or meetings have been arranged at hospitals so that first hand information would be available.

The hospital staffs have been most painstaking in their efforts to provide the required information, and the hospitality invariably shown has left the recipients with many pleasant memories.

Other developments were taking place concurrently. Formal contact was made with the Medical Supplies Working Party set up by the Minister of Health to advise him regarding hospital equipment. The Working Party, which supervises the work of some twenty or so specialist groups dealing with specific subjects, is a complementary organisation to the Advisory Committee. There is a joint arrangement regarding standards for hospital equipment and an adequate liaison between the two bodies has been in effect for some time. In many cases, members of the various groups are also members of B.S.I. committees, which not only strengthens the co-operation, but provides another means of securing user representation.

Reference was made earlier to the B.S.I. industry standards committees. That possessing chief interest to the hospital profession is one dealing with surgical instruments and medical appliances. Another is one dealing with scientific glassware and related laboratory apparatus. These committees, as has been explained, are fully representative and are autonomous. In addition to considering whether or not there is a valid case for proceeding with suggestions reaching them from other sources, they can and do initiate projects themselves. The relevant recommendations of the Advisory Committee are passed to them, as are those of the Medical Supplies Working Party. Both these industry standards committees are supervising the work of a number of technical committees. Draft standards prepared by the latter are circulated to the Advisory Committee at the comment stage and arrangements can readily be made for such drafts to be discussed in committee so that, if necessary, a corporate opinion may be expressed.

The second report of the Advisory Committee, which was issued in April, 1950, as 12 CM(OC)1178, provided a record of its own work and also referred to that of these other authorities.

In the first category, it was hoped, when the report was published, that British Standards would shortly be available for the following:—

General purpose ward beds, children's cots bedside lockers, surgeon's rubber gloves, rubber tubing, air rings, woollen blankets.

It was indicated that draft standards should shortly be issued for the remaining rubber products mentioned in the first report, whilst the following new subjects were in the hands of technical committees:—

Rest beds, electrically-heated bed cradles, over-bed tables, over-knee bed tables, bed strippers, examination couche, soiled-linen containers and stand, soiled-dressings bucket stands, oxygen cylinder stands, operating theatre soiled-dressings containers. ("kick-abouts.")

The items being handled under the aegis of the two industry standards committees included:—

Catheters (two types), hypodermic syringes (two types), dental syringes, forceps (two types), amputation knives, scalpels, bistouries, theatre hollow-ware (stainless steel), lamps in diagnostic and endoscopic instruments, parts for walking calipers, graduated beakers, blood transfusion apparatus, micro-pipettes, micro-burettes, sphygmomanometers.

It is thus apparent that a very large programme of work has developed in what is, relatively, a short time. It should be remembered that, until the inaugural work of the B.H.A. was commenced, which led to the present developments, there had been no corporate approach to this large and complex problem. The initiation of the programme coincided with a time of considerable readjustment in all walks of life, following the second World War, and its development was complicated by the social changes of the period. The results, viewed in this light, are thought to be satisfactory.

Oversea and International Work on Standards

So far, only indirect reference has been made to the question of the standards movement oversea. There are national standards organisations in practically every civilised country, many of which are doing useful work in the hospital field. The B.S.I. maintains contact with them all, and its library possesses an unrivalled collection of oversea standards. These may be consulted by any subscribing member and those of relevance to the work of any particular technical committee are tabled for reference.

Arising from the individual work of the national organisations is the international movement. This is conducted under the auspices of the International Organisation for Standardisation (I.S.O.) of which the B.S.I., in common with the vast majority, is a member. There is already a number of I.S.O. technical committees dealing with subjects of interest to the hospitals, notably gas cylinders and blood transfusion apparatus.

The primary purpose of this international movement is to co-ordinate the national standards of the member bodies. Only in special circumstances will international standards be issued. It is one of the basic needs of effective international collaboration that the national movement should be active, preferably possessing published standards of its own. Thus the work being done by the B.S.I. committees dealing with standards for hospital equipment may possess more than its immediate value if it forms the basis of the United Kingdom case in any international discussions that may develop.

General Considerations

In the section on marking schemes, it was indicated that the B.S.I. is a non-trading organisation. The Institution obtains its income from the subscriptions of its members (local authorities; professional institutions; industrial and commercial organisations; private individuals), from the sale of its publications and from a Government grant-in-aid. These funds are entirely expended on publishing costs, staff salaries and overhead expenses.

The Institution is independently governed by a General Council which is formed of the elected representatives of the divisional councils and the nominees of Government departments and the founder institutions. The divisional councils are, in turn, formed of the elected representatives of the industry standards committees and the nominees of Government departments and relevant professional organisations. The divisional councils are charged with co-ordinating the work of the industry standards committees and the General Council exercises supervisory control over matters of policy and administration.

The growth in the activities of the Institution provides sufficient indication of the increasing importance attached to its work. For example, the number of British Standards that had been issued by 1936 was about 700. In the next ten years, this number had almost been doubled. Similarly, during the same period, the number of committees rose from around 850 to 1,500. These figures continue to show marked progress and the Institution has latterly been engaged on organising itself to deal with the increased demands for its services and to secure that these are dealt with effectively and as expeditiously as practicable. On this latter point, the B.S.I. is sometimes criticised on the score of slowness, but an examination of these complaints has shown that extraneous influences, rather than faults in the system, are more often the cause. It is perhaps appropriate, in any case, to quote the Minister of Labour, Mr. George Isaacs, in this connection, although he was speaking of a different subject :—

"The ways of freedom are sometimes more laborious than the swift and drastic solutions of authoritarianism, but its achievements are likely to be more durable because they are based on free choice and personal conviction."

With this thought, therefore, and in the light of the accomplishments already recorded, one can look forward with confidence to an increasing measure of service to the hospitals from the efforts being devoted to developing British Standards for their equipment.

Organisation and Methods in the National Health Service

Establishment Officer, Cornwall County Council

THE field of activity somewhat loosely known by the generic term of "public administration" has been enormously extended in recent years. In days of old, the primary functions of government were to preserve peace at home and to protect the State from foreign aggression. In more recent times, central government has to a large extent become responsible for planning, co-ordinating and controlling the economic and social life of the nation. In this process, central government has conferred many powers, duties and functions of paramount importance to the Welfare State on the various types of statutory administrative bodies. A wide range of positive social duties have been placed on the Local Government Service and new bodies such as the National Health Service, have been created by statute. Further, many important schemes of social activity are directly administered by government departments, such as the Ministry of National Insurance. The ultimate success of the changed concept of "public administration" depends to a great extent on the efficiency of the administrative machine, and, therefore, one of the most urgent problems at present confronting all public authorities is the devising of procedures and techniques whereby this administrative machine can be improved. In so far as the Civil Service is concerned, this problem has been met by the adoption of the Organisation and Methods technique, generally referred to as O. and M. This approach to the problem has been conspicuously successful in the Civil Service, and the Departmental Committee on Local Government Man-power has recommended the adoption of O. and M. techniques in local government. Many local authorities have already taken steps to introduce some measure of O. and M. procedures, and these authorities report that much good work has been achieved. The principles of O. and M. are equally valid for all public authorities, and there is much, therefore, to commend this approach to efficiency to the bodies which constitute the National Health Service.

Civil Service Experience

It may be worthwhile firstly to examine the experience of the Civil Service. The efficiency principles now known by the title of Organisation and Methods are not new—they have been practised by industrial and commercial concerns for many years under such nomenclature as systems research, methods research, efficiency consultants and the like. The Civil Service has taken these basic principles and applied them to the particular needs of the public service. This approach to organisational efficiency is carried out by advisory officials within the Service rather than by the employment of outside consultants. This point is of fundamental importance to O. and M. in the public services, in which details of organisation and the methods employed must be conditioned by the statutory constitutions and limitations of the bodies concerned. Only the officer who understands these constitutional complexities from within can appreciate the organisational problems involved and can propose efficiency devices which are administratively possible, as well as being acceptable to the officers whose work is affected. This is equally applicable to the National Health Service as it is to the Civil Service.

Although the Royal Commission on the Civil Service in 1931 recommended that provision should be made for the setting up of a small staff to give continuous attention to the problems of efficiency and economy in departmental organisation, it may be said that O. and M. in the Civil Service began in 1940. At first, the officers responsible for this work were all attached to the Treasury, but as the scheme progressed many departments set up their own O. and M. teams, leaving the Treasury to give help to the smaller departments which had made no such provision. It is a fundamental axiom of the O. and M. approach that advice should come from within each concern rather than being imposed from the outside. The work of O. and M. in the Civil Service was examined by the Select Committee on Estimates in 1942 and 1947, and in the latter year the Committee was so impressed with the success achieved that it recommended the appointment of more O. and M. officials, who should be given better status and higher remuneration — an unprecedented action for a Select Committee on Estimates.

Functions of O. and M.

In considering O. and M. procedures for the National Health Service, it is necessary to give a firm definition of this technique. Perhaps the most comprehensive is that given in the Fifth Report of the Select Committee on Estimates (which has become one of the standard texts on the subject) —" The purpose of O. and M. in the Civil Service is to secure maximum efficiency in the operation of the Government's executive machinery; and, by the expert application of scientific methods to organisation, to achieve economy in cost and labour. The operations of the O. and M. service, although not directed primarily to securing reductions in staff, almost invariably result in the more economical use of staff." Wherever the word " economy " or its derivatives occurs in O. and M. work it should be construed in its original Greek meaning of " household management "—the best use of available resources.

O. and M. is not an establishment survey and it is not a system of staff inspection. Both these devices are, of course, necessary for ensuring the efficient and economical use of man-power, but they very properly come within the general province of personnel administration. O. and M., on the other hand, is concerned with ensuring that the concern has the most suitable organisational structure (organisation) and that the best possible methods are used in carrying out the details of the work (methods). O. and M., therefore, is a technique for the continuous planned review and improvement of the organisation and of the work methods employed. The results of O. and M. examination and constructive report promote both efficiency and economy.

The functions of the staff employed on O. and M. may range from planning the whole of the organisation and methods of a new section to recommending improvements in the design of forms. O. and M. officers give expert advice on office mechanisation. They advise on the co-ordination of work, both as between sections of a department and between departments. They make recommendations as to the most efficient and economic manner of carrying out the administrative and clerical operations of each level of staff. There is no limit to the range of their duties. In the higher levels they might deal with the most effective way of allocating functions between committees and departments, and, at the other extreme, they may make recommendations on the use of such devices as " window " envelopes, the lighting of offices and the reorganisation of filing systems. The function of the O. and M. officer is to give a critical examination of every part of the work, to find out why each operation has to be carried out, whether it is necessary, and, if so, the best method of doing it. Each job must be considered in relation to the work of other sections and departments, and the whole of the work must be planned and co-ordinated so as to achieve maximum efficiency with minimum man-power.

It must be made clear at this stage that O. and M. is an advisory service. The results of an investigation and any consequent recommendations are tendered as advice to the head of the section or department, who is constitutionally responsible for the organisational efficiency of the work under his charge. It has been found in practice, both in the Civil Service and the Local Government Service, that worthwhile O. and M. advice is invariably accepted by the executive staff concerned. Indeed, many O. and M. assignments actually originate at the direct request of departmental heads, who soon get in the habit of calling for expert advice. Other assignments may, of course, originate because of an application for increase of staff and the employing authority may decide that an O. and M. investigation be carried out before considering the application. But whatever may be the origin or nature of the assignment, the decision on the acceptance or otherwise of the O. and M. recommendation will not be made by the O. and M. staff—that is a matter for the executive decision of the head of the department concerned and/or the employing authority. It must be emphasised that the O. and M. function is advisory, and the staff serve in an advisory capacity; they must never interfere in the line of authority.

Types of Assignments

The O. and M. approach does not imply any criticism of managerial, administrative or executive staff. The people at the top of a branch of any important organisation are busy men and women, and they seldom have the time to sit back and review either the organisational structure or the details of the work methods of the concern. In most specialised matters, they seek the advice of specialists, and it is becoming increasingly recognised that the complexities of organisation and methods are highly specialised subjects. The O. and M. adviser is the specialist in this field. This does not mean that O. and M. is an esoteric mystery to which only a privileged trained minority have the key; this point will be mentioned later in dealing with the type of persons who should be placed on O. and M. work.

In amplification of the previous paragraph it may be worthwhile to instance a few hypothetical assignments having some general relevance to all or some of the bodies forming the National Health Service. An assignment may be " vertical " (dealing with the problems of a particular section or department) or it may be " horizontal " (dealing with the common or inter-related problems of two or more departments). A possible assignment at the highest level in the machinery of government of an employing authority might be an examination of the committee and sub-committee system and the allocation of duties to these agents. In this review it may sometimes be found that avoidable complications and unnecessary work are caused by faults in the committee structure. There may be an intricate series of sub-committees with over-lapping terms of reference, making it necessary for even routine matters to be considered by more than one of these sub-committees before report is made to the parent committee. Time is wasted and irritation caused by matters having to be taken from one sub-committee to another without any finality of decision, while the recommendations of one sub-committee may be reversed by another, leaving it to the parent committee to resolve the differences by a firm recommendation to the employing authority. As well as consuming the time of officials who have to prepare several versions of similar data for submission to these sub-committees, there is also much unnecessary work for the shorthand-typing and clerical staff. Similar circumstances arise when authorities and committees refuse to delegate authority, with power to act, to their chairmen to decide minor routine questions within the framework of the agreed policy of the authority. Again, some common services, such as staffing or accommodation or supply provisions, are better co-ordinated by a functional committee rather than being left to the unco-ordinated decisions of a series of possibly competitive sectional sub-committees. Where faults are found in the committee structure, it may well be that improvements would not only result in more efficient and better co-ordinated consideration of the particular questions, but organisational economies and simplifications would also follow in all sections of the authority.

Other horizontal assignments at the lower level of organisation and methods, rather than the machinery of government, might deal with the inter-departmental use of addressing machines and similar appliances, the registration of incoming mail and general despatch arrangements, the co-ordination and simplification of official forms, co-ordination and abbreviation of official advertisements, and pay-roll systems. It must be kept in mind that wage and salary payment methods are not the exclusive concern of the finance officer. Before he can make his calculations and arrange for payment, according to whatever may be the system in operation, he must be supplied with the basic information of new appointments and terminations, sick-leave and other absences, overtime and many other kindred variable factors. This data must originate from the section, unit or hospital in which the employee is employed, and the stream-lining of notification methods can increase efficiency, speed up pay operations, eliminate overlapping of work and save in man-power.

Assignments of a vertical character can deal with any or all of the organisation and methods of a section or department. They can be concerned with overhauling the systems of record keeping or the breaking down of a complicated job into a series of simple operations to be carried out by routine clerks. Further, almost every organisation needs a systematic review at given periods—not only will it be possible to devise organisational improvements, but it may also be found that some procedures have outlived their original purpose and usefulness. For example, in most concerns there is a tendency for records to be maintained and regularly written up long after the purpose for which the records were required has ceased to exist. This is hardly applicable yet to any of the bodies of the National Health Service, and it would be one of the functions of an O. and M. review to prevent such situations from occurring.

The O. and M. approach is invaluable in devising official forms. When the drafting of a new form is suggested, the first questions to ask are, " Is a new form really necessary ? " " Is the information already being collected by some other form ? " If, after careful scrutiny, it is proved that a new form must be produced, the O. and M.-minded officer scrutinises similar forms to find out whether some other form could be re-drafted so that the new information could be secured without adding to the total number of forms. Indeed, an enquiry starting in this way can lead to a full-length horizontal assignment, resulting in a rationalising of forms and reduction in their number. The drafting of forms, however, is also a question demanding careful attention. They should be as simple and straightforward as possible, especially when the questions will have to be answered by the semi-literate, and there should be no ambiguity in the wording. At the same time, the order of the questions should be settled so as to be economical in time and effort to the clerks who will be called upon to collate and record the results. For example, if the replies to questions have to be entered seriatim in a register, the order of question on the form should follow that of the register. Again, when copies of the form have to be sent to the same persons at specified intervals any static data can be pre-printed on the forms by means of addressing machines. There are many other devices for promoting simplicity and economy in the design of forms, and, in fact, the O. and M. Division of the Treasury have published a useful guide-book to the subject. In the matter of forms, the drafting of many of the documents and procedures in the National Health Service is conditioned by statutory instruction and Ministerial model. There is still, however, much scope for the O. and M. efficiency approach in all employing authorities of the Service. The drafting of forms and the prevention of their proliferation is so important that one of the largest local authorities has appointed a " forms officer " in each of the major departments and these officers carry out their duties in conjunction with the O. and M. unit.

O. and M. Staff

The staff engaged on O. and M. work are not supermen endowed with some sixth sense for diagnosing work method faults. They are ordinary officers who know the constitutional background of the particular services, who are capable of taking a detached and objective view of work problems, who have a faculty for delving into detail and who have taken some trouble to train themselves in up-to-date organisational techniques. Further, the successful O. and M. practitioner must have a good measure of tact in dealing with the officers whose work he is reviewing—he must be able to secure their co-operation and gain their support in his ultimate recommendations. He must be capable of " selling " his O. and M. advice.

In the Civil Service, courses of training for O. and M. officers are carried out by the Treasury O. and M. Division. There is as yet no such provision for the Local Government Service, although a few local authorities have sent officers to the Treasury courses. The Institute of Public Administration has been considering the practicability of establishing some form of training courses for the public services in general, and such facilities would be open to officers of the National Health Service. It is unlikely that such a scheme will materialise in the immediate future, and, in the meantime, it is advisable for interested employing authorities in both the Local Government Service and the National Health Service to make their own arrangements. The first step is to select an officer with a flair for this type of work and give him the necessary authority and terms of reference to act in an O. and M. capacity. If he has not previously held a specific O. and M. appointment, he should at least possess the personal characteristics which have been listed above. He should also be required to make himself familiar, from the excellent published material available, with the principles of organisation, work methods for offices, the wide range of office machinery and mechanical appliances, and the general principles of the O. and M. approach. There are many officers available in local government and health services who have had a definite flair for this work, although they have as yet had no direct O. and M. experience. They have the advantage of understanding the constitutional background of this form of public employment, as well as the division of authority and activities within the services, which is of inestimable value in the O. and M. approach. As a generalisation, such an officer would probably yield better results than a business efficiency expert with no first-hand experience of public employment.

Most employing authorities would naturally be cautious in setting up an O. and M. service. For a medium-sized authority, say a Hospital Management Committee of average size, it would initially be best to appoint one O. and M. officer, leaving any future developments to be settled in the light of experience. Such an officer would unquestionably have a full-time job. His terms of reference could cover all administrative departments of the committee and all hospitals and other units administered by the committee. It is possible to envisage that in course of time the officer would not only be dealing with administrative and clerical processes, but his advice would be sought on all organisational problems. It is no criticism of existing managements to say that the scope for sound constructive work is unlimited.

Where the size of the employing authority is insufficient to justify a full-time appointment, it would be profitable to allocate O. and M. duties to a suitable officer on a part-time basis. All the foregoing factors regarding the personal qualifications of O. and M. staff would apply, but the officer would only give part of his time to this work, the remainder being devoted to some other duties. On the other hand, two or more smaller authorities might consider combining jointly to appoint a full-time officer, somewhat on the lines of the scheme prepared by the London metropolitan borough councils. There is room for flexibility in such arrangements.

It is wise that officers exercising O. and M. duties should be attached to that part of the administration responsible for the establishment functions of the employing authority. This is not only constitutionally sound, but it works well in practice. Officers responsible for co-ordinating the staff administration of the authority are naturally concerned with organisational efficiency and economy, and it is fitting that O. and M. functions should be linked up with those duties. This is the general prevailing trend and, in the Civil Service, establishment officers are now known as Establishment and Organisation Officers. Such policy is not only sound in practice, but it prevents the multiplication of specialist sections and sub-sections. But here again there is room for flexibility, according to the domestic administrative arrangements of each employing authority.

In conclusion organisational efficiency must ultimately depend on the efficiency of the staff. O. and M. is not a remedy for an inadequate system of personnel selection. The appointment of the right man or woman for each job should be the first aim of every authority. O. and M. will ensure that the organisational and work methods "tools" which that staff have to use are the best which can be devised. Good establishment practice, which includes proper personnel selection, plus O. and M. will earn a fine dividend in efficiency and economy.

Cancer Registration

IN ENGLAND AND WALES

An Enquiry into Treatment and its results, by Percy M. STOCKS

Cancer kills in a single year nearly as many people as our army lost in officers and men in World War II. The object of the registration and follow up scheme, described in this booklet by the Chief Medical Statistician of the General Register Office, is to get much more exact information than we now have about the results of treatment.

NOTES ON DIRECTORY

Hospital Management Committee Officers

The addresses of these officers are given in full except where they are at a hospital included in the group, in which case reference should be made to the list of hospitals for address and telephone details. If the telephone number for the officers is not that of the hospital it is given individually for each officer. Where the address is not at a hospital, the telephone number is given only for the Secretary, unless the other officers have individual numbers.

Senior Officers at Individual Hospitals

The senior officers at individual hospitals whose names are given and the order in which they are always listed are as follows :—

1. Senior non-medical administrative officer, whose name (except when the post is an honorary one) is never followed by any indication of title.

2. Medical Superintendent, whose name is always followed by the abbreviation (Med. Supt.) or a variant such as (Med. officer-in-charge).

3. Matron, whose name is followed by an indication of title, i.e. (Matron), only when no other officers are given for the hospital concerned.

Where additionally the name of the chief male nurse is given it is always followed by the full title in brackets.

Bed Complement

The number of beds shown against each hospital is the total bed complement at 31st December, 1949. The page reference after each hospital management committee is to the details of bed and patient statistics which are given in Section 8.

The type of each hospital is given in the "Notes" column except where it is indicated in the name of the hospital.

Closed and Transferred Hospitals

Where a hospital has been closed, or transferred to another hospital management committee, since 31st December, 1949, this is indicated in this Directory, but for bed statistics of transferred hospitals reference must be made in Section 8 to the hospital management committee to which the hospital belonged on 31st December, 1949.

NOTES ON DIRECTORY

Officers of Boards of Governors

The addresses of these officers are given in full except where they are at a hospital included in the group, in which case reference should be made to the list of hospitals for address and telephone details. If the telephone number for the officers is not that of the hospital it is given individually for each officer. Where the address is not at a hospital, the telephone number is given only for the Secretary, unless the other officers have individual numbers.

Senior Officers at Individual Hospitals

The senior officers at individual hospitals whose names are given and the order in which they are always listed are as follows :—

1. Senior non-medical administrative officer, whose name (except when the post is an honorary one) is never followed by any indication of title.

2. Medical Superintendent, whose name is always followed by the abbreviation (Med. Supt.) or a variant such as (Med. officer-in-charge).

3. Matron, whose name is followed by an indication of title, i.e. (Matron), only when no other officers are given for the hospital concerned.

Bed Complement

The number of beds shown against each hospital is the total bed complement at 31st December, 1949. The page reference after each teaching hospital group is to the details of bed and patient statistics which are given in Section 8.

The type of each hospital is given in the "Notes" column except where it is indicated in the name of the hospital.

Closed and Transferred Hospitals

Where a hospital has been closed or transferred to another group, since 31st December, 1949, this is indicated in this Directory, but for the bed statistics of transferred hospitals reference must be made in Section 8 to the teaching hospital group to which the hospital belonged on 31st December, 1949.

NOTES ON BED AND PATIENT STATISTICS

ENGLAND AND WALES

The page number after the name of each group affords a cross reference to the same group in the earlier directory sections (Sections 4 and 5). The figure given for the total bed complement is in every case that obtaining at 31st December, 1949, and the occupancy rate figures are those for the year ending at that date. It should be noted that the occupancy rate figures may in some cases, due to a reduction of bed complement during the period covered, exceed the figure given for the total bed complement.

Transferred Hospitals

Where a hospital has been transferred to another group since 31st December, 1949 it is shown in this section under the group to which it belonged on 31st December, 1949, but in the earlier directory sections (Sections 4 and 5) it appears under the group to which it has since been transferred.

SCOTLAND

The page number after the name of each group affords a cross reference to the same group in the earlier directory section (Section 6). The figure given for the total bed complement is in every case that obtaining at 31st March, 1950, and the occupancy rate figures are those for the quarter ending at that date, except in the North Eastern Region, where the average daily occupancy is for the year ending at that date. It should be noted that the occupancy rate figures may in some cases, due to a reduction of bed complement during the period covered, exceed the figure given for the total bed complement.

Clinics, although listed in the directory section (Section 6), are not included in this section, no statistics in respect of them being available.

Convalescent and chronic sick beds are included under General Medicine, and V.D. beds under Infectious Diseases.

JOINT USER INSTITUTIONS

Bed Complement

Bed complement firgues are given under the following heads :—

Acute
Mat. = Maternity.
Chr. = Chronic.
I.D. = Infectious Diseases.
T.B. = Tuberculosis.
Men. = Mental (other then Mental Deficiency).
M.D. = Mental Deficiency.
Other
Pri. = Private Patient.
P.P. = Part-Payment.

The category "Acute" covers all general and special acute beds other than those for private patients or for maternity, I.D., T.B., or mental treatment. The category "Mental (other than Mental Deficiency)" covers all mental treatment beds (other than for mental defectives) including psychiatric beds in general hospitals. The category "Other" covers beds which do not fall under any of the other categories. Wherever known the nature of the beds included under "Other" is indicated in the "Notes" column. All private patient beds whether or not reserved for any special types of case, are included under the one heading "Private Patient" i.e. no private patient beds are included under any of the other categories. Part-Payment beds are, on the other hand, included in the first instance under other categories, i.e. Acute, Maternity, etc., and in the total number of beds given in the last but one column of figures. The figures given in ordinary type are the number of beds which are actually available for use. Where, in addition to these beds, the hospital has further beds which, because of shortage of staff or other causes (other than purely temporary causes such as re-decoration), are not available for use, the figures given in italics represent the number of these additional beds.

WATSON
"AUTONOME III"
MOTOR-DRIVEN COUCH

Consider the advantages of this entirely new Motor-Driven Couch . . .

FROM the user's standpoint the "Autonome III" more closely approaches the ideal than any couch hitherto produced. Balance is achieved without the use of any overhead suspension . . . the new "Unipivot" screen mounting—a masterly example of engineering design—must be seen to be appreciated . . . the high-speed Potter-Bucky diaphragm is automatically kept clear of the path of radiation when the screen is in use . . . the sturdy tube stand will support a rotating anode tube without vibration . . . the pedal-operated tilt is smooth and quiet from vertical to ten degrees below the horizontal . . . X-ray protection is more than usually complete.

In addition to the outstanding advantages of the couch itself, a fully automatic serial changer which combines simplicity with versatility forms an integral part of the couch, and the range of accessories anticipates every need.

We shall be pleased to send you an illustrated specification on request.

CONTRIBUTORY AND PROVIDENT SCHEMES

I.—CONTRIBUTORY SCHEMES

The following list details the contributory schemes which are providing benefits and services ancillary and additional to those provided under the National Health Service and National Insurance Acts.

In some cases they represent amalgamations between two or more schemes existing prior to the 5th July, 1948. Where there has been a change in title, the new name is given. The aims and objects of the schemes have been widened on account of the passing of the above-mentioned Acts. Many of the schemes provide a hospital cash benefit and particulars of these and of the other benefits available can be obtained from the secretary of each scheme. Unless otherwise indicated by an asterisk, the schemes are affiliated to the British Hospitals Contributory Schemes Association (1948), Royal London House, Queen Charlotte Street, Bristol, 1. The Honorary Secretary of the Association will be pleased to supply any further information.

WHITLEY COUNCILS FOR THE HEALTH SERVICES
(Great Britain)

DETAILS are given below of the organisation of the Whitley Councils for the Health Services (Great Britain), which have been set up for the negotiation of remuneration and conditions of service for persons engaged in the National Health Service in Great Britain.

The National Machine

The National Whitley Machine consists of a General Council and nine functional councils. The General Council deals with those conditions of service and other matters which affect employees in more than one functional group, e.g. such things as a minimum code of conduct, the preparation of arbitration machinery, arrangements for travelling expenses and sick leave, while each functional council deals with remuneration and all other conditions of service requiring national decision, but affecting only the staff comprised within its group. From this it will be appreciated that the functional councils are not subsidiary to the General Council, but on a level with it, and that they are autonomous bodies, their decisions not being subject to approval by the General Council.

Each council consists of a management side and a staff side, the latter in the case of the General Council comprising representatives from the functional councils, and in the case of the functional councils themselves comprising the various participating staff organisations. It should be noted that the composition of the individual staff sides is entirely a matter for the organisations themselves to determine. The constitution of the General Council, which embodies most of the major features found in those of the functional councils, is published overleaf. The national machinery covers England, Scotland and Wales. To secure the proper representation of Scottish interests, provision has been made for a Scottish Advisory Committee.

Regional Machinery

Provision has also been made for Whitley machinery on a regional basis, the functions of such machinery being to deal with local questions arising from the application of national agreements, and any local disputes arising between management and staff of regional hospital boards, boards of governors of teaching hospitals, executive councils, etc. A further question with which the Whitley Councils are concerned is that of Joint Staff Consultative Committees at hospital level.

Whitley Council Decisions

Decisions of the Whitley Councils are arrived at by agreement between the two sides, sometimes reached after negotiations in the council concerned, and in joint committees of that council. Where agreement cannot be reached, the dispute may be referred to arbitration, where a final decision is given.

Decisions reached in the Whitley Councils are communicated to employing authorities by the Ministry of Health.

Participation in the work of the Whitley Machine

The Minister of Health has made it clear in a parliamentary reply (Hansard, 29th January, 1948) that persons employed in the National Health Service would not be required as a condition of service to belong to any organisation, professional or trade union, but at the same time he expressed the hope that, while there would be no compulsion, such employees would be encouraged to belong to their appropriate organisations. This being so, it was clear that arrangements had to be made for special paid leave for members of health service staffs to attend Whitley Council meetings, including separate staff side meetings and committee meetings directly connected with the Whitley Councils. Arrangements for this were approved at the first meeting of the General Council in December, 1948.

Progress to Date

By the end of 1949 seven functional Councils had been set up and were in full operation, and the General Council had also been fully constituted and in operation. During the past year the Medical Council was constituted, but at the time of going to press a comprehensive Dental Staffs Council participating in the work of the General Council had not been established although there had been set up a Dental Whitley Council (Local Authorities).

There follows more detailed information concerning the scope, constitution and officers of the General Council and each of the seven functional councils in the Whitley machine.

I – TECHNICAL AND GENERAL

ACOUSTIC TREATMENT

There are two units of noise measurement, the phon and the decibel, both of which are required to state the results of measurement, but both of which, for the purposes of the layman, can often be considered almost as equivalents over a wide range of frequencies. Five phons or five decibels is about the minimum change, either deterioration or improvement which is significant in practice.

Equivalent Loudness of Outdoor Noise*

Type of Noise or Locality	Equivalent Loudness (phons)

Average Loudness of Some Common Air-Borne Noises*

Noise	Equivalent Loudness (phons)

Average wireless	65–80
Soft wireless	50–65
Conversation—normal ..	Up to 65
Conversation—quiet ..	Up to 45
Typing and tabulating—noisy office	Up to 80

The scales of ordinary noises, given in phons, are set out in the left hand column and a scale of suggested standards of quiet, below.

Suggested Standards of Quiet*

Occupancy	Loudness (phons)
Study or sleeping	15
Reading or writing	20
Boardroom	30
Sedentary office work .. Quiet conversation	35
Average office, telephone work and restaurant ..	40
Noisy office	60

Noises fall into two categories, airborne noise, conversation and the wireless, and contact noise, footsteps, the movement of furniture and the noise of equipment fixed to the structure of the building. Modern building construction, with its ferro-concrete structure, innumerable pipes and ducts and smooth reflective materials tends to become a sound box if adequate preventive measures are not taken.

Sound Insulation in Existing Buildings

Hospitals in towns offer two problems, the reduction of internal and external noise. The table above giving standards of quiet suggests that in hospitals intruding noises should be reduced to 15-20 phons. The planting of trees and tall hedges as noise screens should not be overlooked as they absorb an appreciable amount of traffic noise.

Outdoor Noise and Treatment of Windows

Regarding insulation against outside noises it is generally found that the windows of a building are less insulating than the walls. The method of ventilation is the limiting factor, for if no provision is made for cross ventilation, then it will often be necessary for the windows to be left wide open with little or no insulating effect. If cross ventilation is the system used, the difference in pressure on the two sides of a building encourages the circulation of the air even if the windows are only slightly open.

*Post-War Building Study No. 14 Sound Insulation and Acoustics. Tables reprinted by permission of H.M. Stationery Office.

Artificial ventilation and air conditioning naturally allow full advantage to be taken of insulating measures.

*Type of Window	*Average Sound Reduction decibels
21 oz. glass	28
Double 21 oz. glass—

1″ ,, ...	42
2″ ,, ...	46

(Best effects in low or medium frequencies, good for traffic)
¼″ plate glass	35
Double ¼″ plate glass 5¾″ apart	58
Double ¼″ plate glass 5¾″ apart, interspace lined with absorbent	63 approx.

Internal sound absorption is also an important point for on this depends the ultimate noisiness of a room. A well furnished office, for example, will provide 5 decibels of sound reduction with the windows wide open. A sparsely furnished office, however, will only give 3 decibels reduction compared with 15-20 decibels if there is adequate cross ventilation and the windows need not be left wide open. Hospitals are fairly bare of furniture and other methods of sound absorption must be attempted.

A good method of absorbing street noise is to place an absorbent on the ceiling above the window where the sound will strike it directly. Noise baffles can be used if there is cross ventilation and the flow of fresh air not impeded. Double windows can be successfully treated by lining the edges of the space between the windows with an absorbent of 1 inch thickness with the inlet for air placed at the top of the outer glass and the outlet into the room at the bottom. If fitted with louvres to deflect the sound this type of window will give good ventilation and about the same sound insulation as a closed window of single glazing.

Indoor Noise

Reduction at source is the first approach. Noisy typewriters should not be used and quiet motors for hospital equipment should be chosen. The plumbing system should be selected with an eye on its silent qualities.

Doors

The sound of doors closing is a common impact noise. Apart from an efficient door stop, felt or rubber can be set as a continuous beading in the rebate against which the door comes to rest. This has the added advantage of making a better closure and thereby cutting off airborne sound from travelling into adjacent rooms.

Walls and Ceilings

Absorbent materials on the walls and ceilings will also reduce airborne noise. There are several varieties of these acoustic tiles and plasters available but the detailed choice must be left to an expert consultant. Generally treatment of the ceiling only is adequate for most parts of the hospital.

Floors

Great attention should be paid to the flooring materials in corridors and other portions of the hospital taking a heavy traffic. If corridors do not have a good resilient flooring they tend to act as sound boxes aggravating the trouble by sustaining the sound of footsteps and reflecting the sound from wall, floor and ceiling. Consequently the usual hard floorings, terrazzo and tile, are bad from the point of view of impact noise reduction.

A scale of sound reduction giving a variety of resilient materials laid on bare concrete is given below :

Material	Reduction in phons
⅛″ lino	5
⅛″ lino on roofing felt ..	5
Wood blocks	5–10
Thin rubber carpet	5–10
⅛″ carpet on ⅛″ underfelt ..	10
¼″ hard rubber cork composition	10
⅛″ sheet rubber on ¼″ sponge rubber	20

APPOINTMENT SYSTEM FOR OUT-PATIENTS

There are many advantages accruing from an efficient appointment system for out-patients. It saves the hospital a great deal of extra work and space and avoids overcrowded clinics by spreading the work evenly over the day. Records staff can look out the patients' folders, and any extra reports on X-rays obtained which may be needed before the clinic opens. An appointments system will show up which clinics are overcrowded and also will facilitate a steady flow of work to ancillary departments. Added to the above advantages from the hospitals' point of view is the primary consideration of the convenience of an appointment system to the patient and his employer in saving time and trouble.

ARTIFICIAL LIGHTING

(See also Electrical Installations and for Emergency Lighting see under that head)

(The following notes have been compiled from information kindly supplied by the Lighting Service Bureau, 2, Savoy Hill, London, W.C.2.)

Definitions

Lumen—the unit of light flux. The total amount of light falling on or intercepted by a surface of one square foot every part of which is at one foot distance from a uniform point source of one candle. The total flux emitted from a uniform light source of one candle power is 12.57 lumens.

Candle—the unit of luminous intensity in a given direction from a point source.

Foot-candle—the unit of illumination, the degree to which a surface is illuminated is measured in lumens/sq. ft. or foot candles. One lumen will light a surface of one square foot to an average illumination of one foot candle.

Brightness—the candle power per unit projected area of the surface in the direction of vision (the apparent area as seen from that direction). The most convenient units to employ depend on whether the surface is self-luminous or not. The candle per square inch and lambert are commonly used for most modern light sources and the foot lambert and milli-lambert for ordinary illuminated surfaces.

1 lambert=1 lumen per sq. cm. reflected or emitted.

1 foot lambert=1 lumen per sq. ft. reflected or emitted.

Lighting Requirements for Hospitals and other Data

A chart giving the average lumens per sq. ft. recommended for various hospital departments will be found on the following page. Tables showing the lumen output and other information regarding standard tungsten lamps and tubular fluorescent lamps together with the approximate transmission factors of a variety of glasses and plastics are also given on the same page.

Interior Decorations and Resultant Illumination

The way the walls and ceilings are coloured and finished considerably influences the degree of ultimate illumination. If the reflection factors of the walls and ceiling are high then necessarily the working area is better illuminated ; it is desirable therefore to use light pastel shades for decoration, matt or eggshell finishes are preferable to glossy.

Relative Costs of Tungsten and Fluorescent Lighting

The following is the method used by the Lighting Service Bureau, 2, Savoy Hill, London, W.C.2, to demonstrate the relative annual operating costs of tungsten and fluorescent lighting. The following factors need to be taken into consideration.

(1) Replacement cost of lamps ; (2) Depreciation allowance for fittings and, in the case of fluorescent or electric discharge lamps, control gear ; usual assessment 10% of the capital cost. (3) Wattage consumed. (4) Number of operating hours per year ; (5) The cost of electric current including kilowatt and outstanding charges where applicable.

If installation and maintenance charges are taken as being substantially equal the following

$$C=\frac{L}{W}+\frac{A}{Wh.}$$

Where, C=The cost of current in pence per unit at which the two installations under comparison will have the same annual cost

L=Excess replacement costs per 1,000 hours of lamps in pence.

Relative to Fluorescent
W=Saving in wattage consumed
A=Excess of annual amortization charges in pence.
h =Thousands of operating hours per annum.

If it is desired to take into account a kilowatt charge then the formula becomes:

$$C=\frac{L}{W}+\frac{A}{Wh}-\frac{K}{1000h}$$

where K=the tariff rate of kilowatt charge in pence.

EXAMPLE

For equal resultant illumination in a typical large interior considering the use of Tungsten Industrial Diffusing Fittings or Fluorescent Trough Reflectors. For every 7 tungsten fittings used only 6 fluorescent would be needed.

Lamp Replacement Costs per 1000 hours

200 watt tungsten $=7\times5/5$
$=455$ pence

80 watt fluorescent $=6\times\frac{19/6}{3}=468$ pence

Thus $L=468-455=13$ pence/1000 hours

Wattage Consumed

Tungsten $=7\times200=1400$
Fluorescent $=6\times90^{*}=540$
Thus $W=860$ watts

* Including watts lost in control year.

Annual Amortization Charges

10 % of cost of 7—200 watt Industrial Diffusers at £3 15s. 0d. each = 630 pence
10% of cost of 6—80 watt Fluorescent Troughs at £10 each =1440 pence

Thus $A=1440-630=810$ pence

Applying the above formula for 1000 hours operation per year.

$$C=\frac{13}{860}+\frac{810}{860}=0.96\text{d. per unit (equal costs)}$$

With 2000 hours operation per year

$$C=\frac{13}{860}+\frac{810}{860\times2}=.487\text{d. per unit (equal costs)}$$

With 500 hours operation per year

$$C=\frac{13}{860}+\frac{810\times2}{860}=1.9\text{d. per unit (equal costs)}$$

Higher KWh charges than the critical ones determined will in each mean that fluorescent lighting is cheaper. By turning the formula round the number of operating hours per year for a given unit charge, at which the costs will be equal can be found. Longer operating hours than this critical one will again result in fluorescent lighting being cheaper.

ECONOMICS OF TUNGSTEN FILAMENT VERSUS FLUORESCENT LAMPS

(for equal light output ignoring capital cost of fittings).

N.B.—The following graph relates to an 80 w. fluorescent lamp with control gear but without fitting and to a 200 w. incandescent lamp also without fitting. The amortization period is ten years. (1948 prices).

BEDS

The four main considerations to be taken into account when selecting beds for the hospital are comfort, strength, hygiene and cost. In the past comfort has been given less consideration than it deserves, particularly when it is remembered that estimates made a few years ago put the cost of bedsteads as low as 0.1 per cent. of the total cost of hospital building and equipment.

The Hospital Bed

The type of bed most widely adopted in general wards is the backrest bedstead of three feet in width. In the interests of hygiene the frame should be of welded tubular construction, the headend and footend bows being of 1¼ inch tube. The bed should be easily adjustable and movable and dust proof. The minimum amount of tubing, always allowing for uprights in the footend to prevent the mattress from slipping through is an asset. Backrests where provided should be incorporated in the head bow and fitted with a locking device to prevent slipping when in use. If pole fittings are incorporated they should be fitted with a stop to prevent rotation through more than half a circle in order to obviate swinging against the wall.

Each leg of the headend should be fitted on a complete ball race swivel with castors of not less than 4 in. diameter. Vulcanised rubber tyres are suitable for ordinary types of flooring. With rubber floors, however, hard composition or hardwood wheels should be substituted. The footend should be fitted with a wheeling device which does not require undue exertion on the part of the operator to bring the wheels into action.

The finish should be carried out in best quality stoving enamel. In recent years there has been a trend away from black, and aluminium finish is now more widely used.

B.S. 1682 : 1950 covers a bedstead 6 ft. 6 in. long by 3 feet wide with spring mattress at 2 ft. from the floor.

Spring Mattresses

To fit the head and footends of the above type of bedstead a spring mattress and frame 6 ft. 6 in. × 3 ft. will be required. There should be not fewer than 16 springs at each end in the 3 ft. wide frame. All links and hooks in the mesh should be sufficiently closed to prevent their becoming detached on removal of tension and should not provide any projections which might damage an overlay.

Section 2 of B.S. 1682 gives specifications for spring mattresses.

Overlay Mattresses

Until recently a good pattern hair mattress has been standard but the internal spring mattress, or similar rubber centred types where each part yields directly to the pressure applied to it, are becoming more widely used in hospitals. Internal springs should be rust-proofed so that they stand up to sterilisation processes.

Special Bedsteads

There are many types of special bedsteads on the market for treating special cases. A point to be borne in mind with " Fowler Position " bedsteads is to ensure that this type of bedstead, which was originally intended for recovery after abdominal operations, really does give a true " Fowler Position." This type of bed has a wide application for general nursing as the patient can be brought into a sitting position with the minimum of effort and strain and nursing is thereby facilitated.

With regard to fracture bedsteads the main problem is mechanical. A device is therefore needed for applying more than one force to each of one or more limbs of the patient with a full range of adjustment both for direction and magnitude. Such forces need to be balanced because the patient's body, owing to small movements, will tend to travel in the direction of any force however small. For treatments of the lower limbs some method of raising the foot of the bed would therefore appear essential. Several types of fracture beds are available. All bedsteads for fracture treatment have other uses and in general are adapted for any cases needing extension, abduction, suspension or immobilisation of the limbs or trunk.

CATERING

Buying

Except in the largest of hospitls all buying of commodities and equipment to be used in the catering section should preferably come under the direct aegis of the catering officer. Where buying is a full-time job every order must bear his approval for it is only in this way that he can keep in touch with market trends, etc. To ensure that the quality, variety and price of his requirements are satisfactory, it is imperative that he should interview personally all travellers, for by personal contact much more can be achieved than by the forwarding of formal orders and enquiries. The contract method, which is so prevalent among hospitals, is a system to be abhorred. Although it provides an easy method of obtaining requirements, after the initial preliminaries have been finalised, it prohibits taking advantage of seasonal changes, and it has been found that when contractors are supplying at a fixed price quality suffers and the " individual touch " is sadly lacking. The scope of buying is limited to a considerable extent under present conditions, but there still remains a wide field for the buyer to utilise his capabilities to the full.

Provisions

The bulk buying of provisions can effect considerable economies, but care must be taken that suitable storage is available, that too large a quantity is not ordered and that commodities are utilised in the order of delivery. By direct purchase from manufacturers of biscuits, jams, cereals, etc., the financial advantage gained is considerable, but it must be borne in mind that by having several suppliers of similar commodities the keenest prices are obtainable comparable with quality. Where it is inconvenient to deal directly with manufacturers or importers, recourse should be made to wholesalers of which it is advisable to have two, three or four for each particular type of foodstuff.

Bulk purchase of tea should be no haphazard operation, and prior to purchase a good blender's advice should be sought as to a blend suitable for use with the local water.

Some items do not lend themselves to bulk buying, among which may be listed cooking fats, margarine, butter and bacon, and these should be bought as required with no more than a day or two's supply in store. These last mentioned commodities which are not suitable for bulk buying should be stored in a cool dark room.

Coffee should only be purchased in small quantities and ground for use daily. It might be opportune to mention that the general standard of coffee-making throughout hospitals leaves much room for improvement.

It is an advantage to have separate stores for service and bulk storage and these should be situated on the north side of the building away from all heating apparatus and kept at an even temperature. On arrival all provisions, after checking and weighing, should be placed immediately into the bulk store, and when required for service, should be drawn therefrom, thus maintaining complete control and visual stocktaking.

Fish

The practice of buying fish direct from the coast presents many difficulties, among which is that of ensuring that the requisite type is received and delivery completed in accordance with schedule. It has been found more satisfactory to purchase from local sources on a day-to-day basis, thus taking advantage of the normal price fluctuations initiated by the law of supply and demand. It is false economy to concentrate on the cheap varieties, such as cod, for it will be found that if turbot sole, lobster, red mullet, trout, etc., are provided, the initial cost, although higher, is recompensed by the resultant lower wastage factor and the raising of catering standard.

Meat

Only by daily contact with the butcher can meat supplies be kept at a high standard. On the catering officer's knowledge and experience depends the production of well-balanced menus, for in conjunction with an experienced larder cook a variety of meat dishes can be made available from the small ration at present allowed. Theoretical knowledge cannot take the place of practical experience in the buying of meat. Offal and poultry offer ways of supplementing the meat supply, but as poultry is used predominantly for special diets, the source of many popular dishes is lost. It will be found, however, that if care and intelligence are used when providing poultry, the price per portion of this welcome addition to the menu is not prohibitive. For stock purposes, a constant supply of fresh beef bones is a matter of importance.

Crockery, Cutlery and Glassware

Purchases of the above should be made direct from manufacturers in all cases and the number of patterns should be kept to a minimum, thus entailing the holding of smaller stocks. Mainly due to its appearance, the use of earthenware has been found unsatisfactory and wherever possible good glazed china should be used, but this should be withdrawn immediately when chipped or cracked. The use of plastics is gaining popularity and many types compare favourably with china both in price and appearance. Tumblers made of toughened glass have many advantages over the normal type in length of service, but care should be taken when selecting the design.

The purchase of good quality cutlery is an economy, for its life is long and its appearance well repays the additional expense. Knives should have bone handles and all cutlery should be die-stamped with the name of the hospital, this latter having a deterrent effect on pilferage. To present an attractive appearance both tables and trays must carry a full range of cutlery and the use of meat knives for several purposes is one to be frowned upon. Stocks carried should consist of :—

Soup spoons
Dessert spoons
Tea spoons
Mustard spoons
Meat or large knives
Small and butter knives
Fish knives
Large forks
Dessert forks
Fish forks

The selection of condiment sets is a controversial point but the screw-topped glass types have many advantages and lead undoubtedly in the matter of appearance. In addition to the usual run of plates, etc., an item which has come to the fore in recent times is the stainless steel ice cup, the life of which continues ad infinitum. It has many uses for individual trifle, ices, coupes, jellies, etc., and adds considerably to their appeal.

Cooking utensils such as saucepans and stewpans should be made of tinned copper, but these should be inspected regularly and re-tinned when required. Stainless steel is a comparative newcomer to the kitchen and has many uses for such items as basins, bowls, trays and pie dishes.

Enamel utensils should not be used under any condition in the kitchens as they chip readily, whilst aluminium vessels have lost a great deal of their popularity through their tendency to discolour badly when in contact with soda water.

Menu Planning

The objects of menu planning are to provide meals that are appetising, satisfying and nutritionally adequate. All too frequently hospital menus are monotonous and show little or no imagination, one of the chief reasons for this being the adoption of a rigid system of menu planning. Opinions differ as to how far ahead meals should be devised but under normal conditions there appears to be no reason why they should be arranged more than 24 hours beforehand. The most convenient time to do this is during the day's tour of the kitchen by the catering officer and his chef de cuisine.

All menus should provide variety and colour and the old idea of " stew on Monday " etc. is a thing of the past. Wherever possible the principal meal of the day should consist of three courses and a choice of three or four main dishes and the same number of sweet dishes. This is not always possible for patients owing to the transportation problems involved, and great thought is required to maintain a number of choices despite this handicap.

" Luncheon " and " dinner " menus should consist of soup or hors d'oeuvres, a substantial main dish of either meat or fish, followed by a sweet. Advantage should be taken of seasonal foods to provide salads and raw fruit in addition to the main menu. A comparatively recent innovation which should not be neglected is the foodstuffs prepared by the " Quick Frozen " method. This opens up a new field in menu planning, and although the apparent cost is high this is to a large extent recompensed by the fact that there is no wastage. Much has been said on the nutritional side of menu planning, but it will be found in practice that if the chef preserves the natural colour, flavour and aroma, any intelligently planned menu will contain all that is required for persons on a normal diet without recourse to analysis by a dietitian.

Service

However well-planned and cooked meals may be, inefficient service will reduce palatability and nutritive value. The ideal is to have the kitchen, service and dining-rooms in one unit, a factor which has been sadly lacking in the N.B.—Figures in square brackets are references to the accompanying notes below.

A gram in the international metric system of weights and measures is about 1/28th oz. A kilogram, which is 1,000 grams, is equal to 2.2 lb.

A milligram is 1/1,000th of a gram. A calorie is a unit of measurement used to express the heat-producing or energy-producing value of food.

NOTES

1. Calorie allowances must be adjusted up or down to meet specific needs. The calorie values in the table are therefore not applicable to all individuals but rather represent group averages. The proper calorie allowance is that which over an extended period will maintain body weight or rate of growth at the level most conducive to well-being.

2. The allowance depends on the relative amounts of vitamin A and carotene. The allowances of the table are based on the premise that approximately two-thirds of the vitamin A value of the average diet in this country is contributed by carotene and that carotene has half or less than half the value of vitamin A.

3. For adults (except pregnant and lactating women) receiving diets supplying 2000 calories or less, such as reducing diets, the allowances of thiamine and niacin may be 1 mg. and 10 mg. respectively. The fact that figures are given for different calorie levels for thiamine and niacin does not imply that we can estimate the requirement of these factors within 500 calories, but they are added merely for simplicity of calculation. In the present revision, riboflavin allowances are based on body weight rather than caloric levels. Other members of the B complex also are required, though no values can be given. Foods supplying adequate thiamine, riboflavin, and niacin will tend to supply sufficient of the remaining B vitamins.

4. There is evidence that the male adult needs relatively little iron. The need will usually be provided for if the diet is satisfactory in other respects.

5. The need for supplemental vitamin D by vigorous adults leading a normal life seems to be minimum. For persons working at night and for nuns and others whose habits shield them from the sunlight as well as for elderly persons, the ingestion of small amounts of vitamin D is desirable.

6. During the latter part of pregnancy the calorie allowance should increase approximately 20 per cent. above the preceding level. The value of 2400 calories represents the allowance for pregnant sedentary women.

7. Allowances for children are based on the needs for the middle year in each group (as 2, 5, 8, etc.) and are for moderate activity and for average weight at the middle year of the age group.

8. Needs for infants increase from month to month with size and activity. The amounts given are for approximately 6 to 8 months. The dietary requirements for some of the nutrients such as protein and calcium are less if derived largely from human milk.

planning of many hospitals. The service room should be equipped with hot plates, bains marie, grills and trolleys. Emphasis must be laid on the importance of ensuring that service of food to the consumer's plate is undertaken by, or under the direct supervision of, a chef or other highly qualified person. Carelessness in service or the provision of over-large portions detracts from the appearance of the meal and goes far to kill appetite.

It is most undesirable for cooked food to be kept hot in containers, or by other means, for any length of time. This is detrimental from the nutritive and palatability viewpoints and therefore prepared foodstuffs coming from the kitchen to the service should be cooked and stored in small units. Many sweet dishes lend themselves to service in individual portions and their appearance can be heightened by the use of stainless steel coupes and other types of attractive containers.

Waste

Whilst waste must be ever present it can be reduced to a minimum by careful planning. Good cooking, efficient service and careful compilation of menus will achieve this object. Beef and poultry bones should be used for stock for the preparation of soups and sauces, and all fat trimmings of meat and poultry should be rendered down for dripping. All fish bones do not lend themselves to use for fish stock; sole and turbot are, however, eminently suitable.

Although the outer leaves of the majority of vegetables may be utilised in the stock pot, vegetables which would impart a predominating flavour, i.e. turnips and swedes, should not be included. Left over vegetables, fish meat, etc., can be incorporated in made-up dishes and hors d'oeuvres. Stale bread should be dried and converted into bread-crumbs, for in this form it can be used in a variety of dishes.

Dietary Standards

Dietary standards serve as a measure in planning diets and food supplies. Standards have existed for many years, but change from time to time as knowledge increases and no standard can be considered as final.

In 1941 the "Recommended Dietary Allowances" drawn up by its Food and Nutrition Board was published by the National Research Council of the U.S.A. They represented the the most authoritative survey of human nutritional requirements made up to that date and became widely accepted. A second edition of the "Allowances" was published in 1945 and a further revision was made in 1948. The accompanying table* sets out the revised 1948 figures.

The "Recommended Dietary Allowances" have been drawn up on the principle of recommending allowances sufficiently liberal to be "suitable for maintenance of good nutritional status."

They are "intended to represent exactly what is implied in a literal interpretation of the words recommended dietary allowances. Hence, in contrast to some previously promulgated standards, the data in the accompanying table are rather to be understood as representing levels of nutrient intakes which the Food and Nutrition Board recommends as normally desirable goals or objectives."

"The recommendations are not called 'requirements' because they are intended to represent not merely the literal (minimal) requirements of average individuals, but levels enough higher to cover substantially all individual variations in the requirements of normal people."

"The figures here recommended are, therefore, generally higher than average requirements but generally lower than the doses used to meet needs created by pathological states or certain environmental conditions or in compensating for an earlier period of depletion."

The recommended dietary allowances represent objectives towards which to aim in planning practical dietaries, and can be attained with a good variety of common foods which will also provide other minerals and vitamins for which requirements are less well known.

CLEANERS AND CLEANING

Although it is advantageous to keep down to a minimum the number and varieties of cleaning agents used in the hospital it is important to bear in mind that certain cleaners although excellent if used for the purpose for which they are intended have a deleterious effect on some materials. Cleaning preparations which contain a great deal of free alkali have a destructive effect on rubber tile, marble and cork, and strong soda causes swelling of linoleum and perforation of marble surfaces. Paint is also adversely affected by free alkali which acts as a form of paint remover, and this should be borne in mind when walls are washed down.

For special methods of cleaning various kinds of flooring materials, see Flooring.

Polishes

Polishes containing hard wax are generally recommended as superior to soft wax products because the latter tend to be slippery and to smear easily. Because of their soft surface they attract dirt and dust and do not provide a good hard wearing surface. A good polish has to be moist enough to remove dirt and have enough solid wax present to ensure a good film. This film should be hard enough to resist easy scratching or marking. It should be dust resisting (non-tacky) and waterproof. Although it is claimed by some manufacturers that their polishes are non-slip this cannot be true in an absolute sense, but only in so far as some are less slippery than others.

Labour and Labour-Saving Equipment

It is essential to use good and reliable labour on cleaning in the hospital, for although the hospital administrator may have a sound working knowledge of the requirements for each particular type of job, if the workmen or cleaners are liable to use their own methods damage may be caused to walls and floors entailing unnecessary maintenance expenditure. For all cleaning jobs definite instructions should be laid down and care should be taken to see that they are rigidly adhered to.

With the difficulty of obtaining domestic labour at present and always bearing in mind the high relative cost of the labour in relation to the work performed, consideration should be given to the use of mechanical cleaning devices wherever possible. A wide range of labour-saving devices are now on the market, electrically-operated floor polishers, vacuum cleaners, scrubbers, mopping machines, bed pan washing machines and gas or electric incinerators for disposal of bandages, etc. Mechanical floor polish sprayers are also available, these heat the solid wax or polish by means of an element in the base controlled by a thermostatic switch and the polish is then sprayed onto the floor by a process of atomisation in consequence saving time in application. Another interesting form of mechanical floor polisher combines both vacuum cleaner and polisher. If these machines are used a reduction in labour costs can be made by a saving in time on the different jobs.

DECORATION

A high standard in decoration of the interior of the hospital is an essential for maintenance. That this decoration should follow an appropriate character and serve a functional purpose has for some years been the subject of scientific research, particularly in the United States. The older hospital interiors decorated in grim dark colours and even the more glaring white are familiar to everyone, that this form of decoration can be improved upon in terms of more rapid recovery for the patient and better seeing conditions for personnel is claimed by the proponents of the scientific use of colour. This subject has recently been receiving a great deal more attention since the case histories of colour conditioning in factories and in other industrial applications have been carefully analysed. In the factory, claims are made that better and more work is produced and that absenteeism is reduced by colour conditioning.

Colour in the Hospital

In the hospital the scientific application of colour can supplement cleanliness and a fine appearance by a large number of additional benefits in terms of better lighting, relief from eye strain and a better mental attitude both on the part of the staff to their work, and on the part of the patients in that it conduces to more rapid recovery. As colour has the power to create a satisfying and cheerful environment so it can be made either exciting or stabilising and create moods suitable to the cases under treatment.

In existing buildings colour can be used to correct unpleasantly-shaped rooms. For example, uncomfortably long or high rooms can be given the effect of being shortened by employing warmer colours on the remoter surfaces and conversely narrow rooms can be made to appear wider by the use of cool colours. Unpleasant shapes can be corrected by banding and striping in colours, which is another form of camouflage.

Lighting

Colours are generally chosen in relation to a daylight standard, but all colouring is relative to its illumination. The customary source of light has been the gas-filled tungsten filament until recent years, but now fluorescent lighting is finding wider application. With the latter, the normal white spectrum will provide colour response reasonably close to that of daylight illumination. Tungsten lighting, however, is deficient in the daylight colours and should be compensated by the avoidance of the violet, blue and green parts of the spectrum unless used in very pale shades, otherwise the reflective value of surfaces so decorated will be inadequate.

(For further details see Artificial Lighting.)

In the development of this colour technique it has been found that ease of seeing is improved when the whole colour field is of a relatively uniform brightness. Pupillary action is then reduced to a minimum by the reduction of the necessity for constant readjustment to varying intensities of reflected light. In consequence a proper balance between paint and illumination, which can be measured scientifically, is called for to eliminate personal preferences which tend to creep in wherever decoration is concerned.

Operating Theatres and Surgical Departments

In order to relieve the surgeon's eyes from the glare of traditional white walls it has been found that bluish-greens create a softer and more uniform seeing condition. Another benefit noted from the use of these colours is that they serve as a complement to the red of human tissue and seeing is more acute for delicate surgical manipulations. These hues are also pleasanter and easier to work in when under severe mental strain. For patients' dressing-rooms green is not recommended but a warmer tone such as peach which creates a feeling of well-being.

The use of white with its high reflecting value can be put to good use in such areas as linen, storage rooms, sterilising rooms and the like where occupancy is infrequent and sanitary appearance is desirable. White is stated to have an encouraging effect on good housekeeping.

Wards

Two factors contribute to the decoration of wards, the psychological aspect and the orientation of the building and rooms. Warm tones tend to be stimulating and are suggested for maternity wards and others where rapid convalescence is desired. For those wards where long-stay or chronic patients are installed cool colours are claimed to achieve a passive and restful effect. With regard to orientation, this principle has long been applied in ordinary domestic colour schemes. Rooms with a north exposure can be painted in warm tones to compensate for the relatively bluish outdoor light and conversely those with a southern aspect in cooler tints to condition them against the greater intensity of light and heat. Soft colours are suggested for all these uses as they are reckoned to be more pleasant to look at and for utilitarian reasons more resistant to soiling and normal abuse.

Ante-rooms, etc.

In lobbies, ante-rooms, solaria, waiting rooms, reception rooms and those areas utilised by visitors and the personnel of the hospital a variety of colour schemes are suggested in order to avoid monotony. The emotional qualities of colour, it is said, can be utilised to stimulate or stabilise and create sensations of warmth or coolness as may be required. Warmly coloured rooms leading into cooler ones tend to break up the monotony and the results are particularly striking where different colours are utilised in adjacent areas.

For corridors which are deprived of natural daylight a simulation of outside conditions can be achieved by the use of ivory, yellow, beige or peach tones. Dining-rooms and class-rooms can also be made to contrast with the surgical departments and wards.

DOORS

In order to lessen the risk of fire, doors should not be made of soft woods but some hard fire-resistant wood such as teak. To prevent noise all doors should be fitted with an efficient door stop and catches that click as the doors close should be eliminated as far as possible.

There are two kinds of flush fitting doors, those in which there is a laminated core similar to the thicker plywoods where the laminations are at right angles to the door surface and the more normal type where there is a built up frame or framed core onto which the plywood sheets are cemented. Flush doors can be constructed solid to meet fire-resisting requirements.

Revolving doors should be made not less than 6 feet in diameter. Various types of sliding doors are on the market. It is suggested that where they are intended to slide round a curved overhead track the leaves of sliding doors should not be greater than 2 feet.

Various types of sliding folding partitions are made. These can be most useful in the nurses' home for dividing the nurses' sitting room from the sister's sitting room, then in the event of social functions the two rooms can be thrown together. When closed these doors or partitions present a completely flush flat surface. On being opened the tops and bottoms slide along small runways in the ceiling and floor so that when they are thrown back the leaves fold right back against each other and end up flat against the wall, taking up very little space and leaving the floor between the two rooms completely free.

B.S. 459, Part 1 : 1944 specifies detailed dimensions for panelled and glazed wood doors for internal use. (The same dimensions are given in Part II of B.S. 459 : 1945 for Flush Wood Doors.)

Door handles and hinges are specified in B.S. 459, Part I. The position of the lock mortice is standardised at 3′ 3″ from the tops of the door. Hinges are placed at 9″ and 5′9″ from the top of the door to the top of the hinge.

ELECTRICAL INSTALLATIONS

Terms and Definitions

Ampere—unit of current or intensity of flow.
Volt—unit of electromotive force or pressure.
Ohm—unit of resistance to the flow of current.
Watt—unit of power, representing a consumption of one ampere at a pressure of one volt.
  Watts therefore are volts multiplied by amperes.
Kilowatts—1,000 Watts.

Supply

Providing reasonable tariff facilities can be obtained the hospital, unless it is remotely situated, will rarely gain by generating its own electricity supply either financially or in terms of fuel. In consequence a mains supply will make one system of wiring available for all purposes.

In Post War Building Studies No. 11 it is stated that provision should be made for a 3-phase, 4-wire 400/230 volt A.C. electricity service derived either directly from an external system of low-tension mains, or from a transformer installed in the building which takes its supply from high-tension mains. When required, adequate and suitable space should be provided for a transformer substation chamber and for a switch and meter room. This should be so placed or insulated accoustically to reduce noise to a minimum.

Rising conductors should be run in readily accessible ducts or chases designed for the purpose, although they may form separate enclosed compartments of larger ducts for services in general. For reasons of fire risk it is desirable to use one vertical duct or chase to serve each wing of a building, the horizontal distribution of the mains to each vertical duct being effected at the level of the intake or transformer chamber. One duct per 5,000 sq. ft. is generally necessary.

With regard to horizontal installations to permanent outlet positions, P.W.B.S. No. 11 recommends the use of vulcanised rubber-insulated cable run in lug-grip-jointed welded or brazed steel conduit placed in the floor either on the shuttering or in screeding of suitable depth, or between floor blocks. All conduits should be run with convenient draw boxes—accessible either from floor or ceiling so that re-wiring may be carried out easily.

The main services to be supplied are general ward lighting (see further Artificial Lighting) operating theatre lighting and special facilities—and emergency lighting (see under Emergency Lighting), refrigeration, X-ray apparatus and space heating (see under Heating), and the staff location system (see under Internal Communications).

Wiring Systems

The conduit system consists of cables run in metal conduit and the best types are heavy gauge, screwed, welded or brazed joints or seamless, solid drawn, which are recommended for hospital work as they provide mechanical continuity and facilitate earthing of the entire system, besides having the advantage, in case of failure, of easy withdrawal and replacement.

The tough rubber covered system consists of twin or three-core cables sheathed in tough rubber. Although the system is not usually earthed all fittings should be made of insulating material. The main advantage of this system is that it can be used with the maximum of concealment where surface wiring is necessary as can lead sheathed cable. Care should be taken that there is no risk of damage to the cables.

Lead covered system. Similar to the above only the twin or three-core cables are sheathed in lead. For fire prevention reasons it should not be installed on oak beams or on new plaster.

The regulations in the field of electrical installations and wiring issued by the Institution of Electrical Engineers are set out in their publication :—Regulations for the Electrical Equipment of Buildings. Reference should also be made to B.S. 1043-1942 The Provision of Engineering and Utility Services in Buildings.

EMERGENCY LIGHTING

Some form of emergency lighting equipment is always necessary in the hospital. Failures in the normal system may occur in several ways, first a failure in the mains current, second a local fuse or other break in the circuit, or third where a hospital generates its own supply, through some technical fault in the generating plant itself.

Emergency Systems

The most efficient system is a complete emergency lighting service utilising one of the following methods for an alternative source of current. These are a secondary connection to the public service, an emergency power-driven generator, or a set of batteries so arranged as to be constantly maintained fully charged in the event of failure. A complete auxiliary circuit should be connected to this emergency source so that all possible internal circuit failures are immediately by-passed, and essential services can be carried on. This secondary circuit should supply the operating theatre lights and a minimum number of lights in wards, corridors and so on to maintain general circulation of personnel and relieve the anxiety of the patients.

The extent of emergency lighting services in the hospital has remained a moot point apart from the vital necessity in the operating theatre. This has been mainly owing to the relatively heavy expense of alternative circuits and the rarity of general failures. If the emergency service is limited to the operating theatre it should be borne in mind that arrangements must be made to include adequate general lighting and lighting of instrument cupboards as well as the main operating lighting equipment.

Battery Systems

There is a variety of methods of using batteries for emergency lighting systems. The small battery light using accumulators, which will maintain a single light, and the large batteries designed to carry a heavy load like the entire emergency circuit of the hospital. The small types of portable emergency light are mounted on a trolley with self-steering rubber-tyred wheels. Both hand-operated and automatic types are available the latter having the advantage of the light coming on instantaneously if the ordinary system fails.

Apart from such portable types the fixed battery systems offer a special service in the operating theatre. A small battery of sealed-in cells can be kept in some convenient part of the building and kept fully charged by a trickle from the mains. This lighting source can then be wired independently to the emergency lighting points provided in the shadowless operating theatre lights, and so arranged, that in the event of a breakdown, or even if the filament of the main lamp breaks, the emergency light points are automatically cut in on the battery circuit. Another type of battery equipment which differs slightly from that just mentioned, in addition to working the shadowless lamp, can also supply current for emergency lights in the theatre and adjoining corridor. This works by a current controlled relay, which in the event of failure cuts in the battery circuit which is wired to the emergency points in the operating lamp and theatre.

The advantage of this last system and the portable battery lights is that they can stand for months without loss of capacity as there are no open circuit losses, no deterioration takes place while the battery is not in use and trickle charges are not necessary.

EXPLOSION RISKS

FIRE PREVENTION

The modern hospital building owing to its ferro-concrete construction is generally speaking fire resisting, the steelwork normally being protected by concrete from the heat of fire, and doors, window frames and the like, generally made of fire resisting wood such as teak. The risk of a small outbreak taking hold in this sort of building is in consequence fairly small.

In the older type of building, however, where there is much woodwork which becomes dry in the course of time, the frequent use of lath and plaster ceilings, soft wood doors and similar inflammable material increase the risk considerably. Where this is so, fire resistant and fireproofing paints and other materials may be applied to woodwork and other parts of the building to prevent a small fire from gaining hold of the structure. Their use, however, seems somewhat limited.

Chemical Extinguishers. All wards should be provided with one of the domestic pattern fire extinguishers, so that in the event of a minor outbreak it can be dealt with by a member of the staff without difficulty. The fire brigade should be called without delay if these immediate measures do not appear to be effective.

It has been suggested that these extinguishers are more effective than the smaller types of hose reels often to be found in hospitals, which cause a great deal of mess for a very small fire.

Hose Reels. These are intended for use by the hospital staff to keep larger fires at bay pending the arrival of the fire brigade and not for use where an extinguisher would be more effective.

Fire Risk Areas

Generally speaking the causes of fire are so numerous that it is difficult to lay down rules. Cigarettes and matches are often the cause of fire. Electric irons are left on ironing boards, dresses get caught in electric fires and so on.

Electrical Fittings. Rules should be made with regard to the use of electrical fittings, particularly with regard to the abuse of points and electric light sockets by the staff in living and bedrooms. All kinds of adaptors, unorthodox connections, two-way switches and the like will be used with consequent fire risk if measures are not taken to prevent such occurrences.

Fixed electric fires, provided that they have an efficient guard, are not in general so dangerous as the portable fire and the use of the latter should be discouraged.

If proper maintenance is carried out by the engineers department on the electrical equipment it is unlikely to give any trouble or risk of fire.

Where old buildings have been acquired as nurses' homes it must be pointed out that lead covered electrical wiring must not be placed in close contact with old oak beams.

Oil Lamps and Stoves. Oil lamps and stoves should be eliminated as far as possible with present fuel and heating shortages for they are an everpresent danger of fire should they be knocked over.

Kitchen Apparatus. Although kitchen apparatus is seldom responsible for an outbreak of fire the ventilation system drawing air out of the kitchen should be periodically cleaned to see that throughout the run of the ductwork the highly inflammable grease which accumulates over time is removed. Dampers should be provided at suitable points and should be made to operate automatically by means of a fusible link which melts at relatively low temperatures. The damper will then be allowed to close and cut off the passage of flame.

Operating Theatres—Explosion Risks—See under that head).

X-Ray Department. With the use of non-inflammable film and provided electrical equipment is satisfactorily maintained the X-ray Department is unlikely to be the source of an outbreak of fire.

Boiler Houses. Boiler houses are very rarely the cause of fire because they are constantly under supervision. Care should be taken, however, to see that flues of boilers, economisers and the base of the chimney are periodically cleared of soot. Oil fuel, of course, should be stored underground away from the risk of fire. Spontaneous combustion in coal dumps can be prevented by the insertion of vent pipes in suitable positions.

Fire Organisation

Whilst immediate action should be taken to extinguish an outbreak of fire it should simultaneously be reported to some authoritative centre. This will be dependent on the size and layout of the hospital. In a large hospital instant communication should be available to the chief administrative officer, medical superintendent, matron, engineers' department and the porter's lodge. Arrangements can then be made by all those responsible for the administration of the hospital and the porter can prepare for the arrival of the fire brigade. Each hospital administrator will need to work out a rigid procedure applicable in all details to his own specific needs.

Voluntary fire squads are established in many hospitals and if these are given periodic practices and training they will be able to deal with all small outbreaks rendering the arrival of the fire brigade unnecessary ; even at worst they should be able to hold a fire at bay until the arrival of heavier equipment.

Alarm signals should not generally take the form of hooters or sirens as they are liable to cause panic among the patients. An alternative is an electrically operated system which sounds bells at specific points, for example the chief administrator's, the medical superintendent's and matron's offices, the boiler house and porter's lodge (as suggested above) an indicator showing the point of origin of the call. The internal telephone system can also be used so that the person required may be located as soon as possible.

If the internal telephone system is used it can serve a very similar function to the alarm bell system. If a special fire call is given the caller can be connected with all the above points and has the advantage of being able to describe the nature of the outbreak.

FLOORING

The main considerations to be borne in mind in the selection of flooring materials are cost, durability, appearance, ease of cleaning and maintenance, comfort in walking and non-slip properties.

Asphalt Tile or Mastic Tile

Mastic tile is attractive in appearance and not expensive to install. It is manufactured in many sizes and colours and has an asphalt base. It is resilient, but is liable to be marked fairly easily by heavy furniture with small bearing surfaces, which will leave small pits in the surface. These, if not severe, may in many cases be ironed flat, but there is always the danger of changing the colour. With regard to colour, the darker ones, owing to their higher asphalt content, are better wearing than light which, although they do not show footmarks so easily, are liable to be stained more readily. Light colours are also more expensive.

A firm sub-floor, such as concrete is necessary, and in order to prevent breakage and loosening of the tiles they should be of an adequate thickness.

Cleaning. Sweeping and washing with water and waxing when necessary with a type of wax recommended by the makers will keep mastic tiles in good condition. As oils and petrol attack asphalt oily substances and soap should not be used for cleaning.

Asphalt

A very similar flooring to the mastic tile above as regards wear. Oils affect asphalt in the same way. It tends to wear unevenly.

Ceramic Tile

Ceramic tile is resistant to damage, stains, grease, oil and chemicals. Its long life offsets the expense of installation to a large extent. It is most advantageously used in wet places, bathrooms, operating rooms, steriliser rooms and where a hard surface is most useful. Patterned and coloured varieties of tiles can be obtained. In bathrooms it is essential to use tiles with a high abrasive content to prevent the danger of slipping.

Cleaning. Ceramic tile is easily cleaned. Strongly acid or alkaline cleaners should not be used, for although they will not affect the tiles, damage is caused to the cement settings. Soap should not be used as it tends to leave a greasy film enabling dirt and dust to adhere.

Concrete

Concrete is the cheapest type of floor, but needs skilful laying and curing by frequent powdering. Although colours can be added before mixing they tend to fade. There are two disadvantages, first a tendency to dusting, and second for cracks to appear. These cracks can be repaired but spoil the floor's appearance. Its use is mainly restricted to store rooms, basements, engine rooms and where there is heavy traffic. It is also useful as a sub-floor on which other types of flooring such as rubber, mastic or cork can be directly laid. Paint may be used on concrete flooring, but if there is much traffic it has to be applied frequently.

Cleaning. Although sweeping is generally sufficient in the majority of cases, water should be used if necessary. Soap may be used or an abrasive powder with water. Generally speaking, however, soap is to be avoided as it tends to leave a greasy deposit. Stains are difficult to remove from concrete.

Cork

Cork is an expensive flooring material, but is very silent in use. Cork tiles are made by heating and compressing granulated cork and are available in several textures and shades of brown. Tiles vary in thickness but can be obtained up to 18 ins. square. They are fixed in the same way as linoleum and some varieties have tongued and grooved edges for added security in laying. Surfaces are sanded off and polished.

Cleaning. Polishes recommended by the manufacturers. It wears fairly easily under heavy traffic and is difficult to maintain.

Linoleum

Linoleum is perhaps more generally used in hospitals than any other kind of flooring. It is made of ground cork and linseed oil, gums, resins and pigments. Both coloured and patterned linoleum is obtainable and is inexpensive. It is comfortable to walk on and sound absorbing. Pits and scratches can be avoided if furniture is not mounted on gliders or castors, but it needs careful maintenance if long life is to be obtained. Linoleum in tile form or cork tiles are not in general favour although damaged areas can be replaced fairly readily if these are used.

Painted back linoleum should only be used on wood floors. Plain backed is necessary for fixing to concrete as a strong resinous cement is used for fixing. Linoleum must not be laid on a concrete floor in direct contact with the ground unless there is a continuous asphalt or similar damp course.

B.S. 810: 1938, specifies linoleum in thicknesses ranging from 1.90 to 6.70 millimeters: cork carpet in thicknesses of 2.50 to 8.00 millimeters.

Cleaning. Sweeping with hair brooms or oil mops keeps linoleum clean. If it is necessary to wash the floor, lukewarm water should be used and a little neutral soap may be added. Some hospitals wax their linoleum floors more frequently than every six months.

Marble

Marble paving slabs are usually ¾ in. to 1 in. in thickness and may be obtained finely sanded or finely gritted. It is expensive, but has a fine appearance and good wearing qualities.

Cleaning. As dirt does not cling easily to marble, cleaning is comparatively easy. Sweeping, with occasional mopping, will be adequate to keep it clean. Ammonia, strong alkali, acids and abrasives should be avoided.

Quarry Tile

Quarry tile is less expensive than ceramic tile but has the same length of life. It is considered very suitable for kitchens, cafeterias, dining rooms, X-ray rooms and dark rooms. Those parts of the floor surrounding steam cookers should be specially watched and preserved as cement erodes in steam. Its use should be avoided in wet places because of a tendency to become slippery.

Cleaning. Quarry tile is easily cleaned, but becomes slippery when wet and greasy.

Rubber

The low cost of maintenance and long life of rubber flooring to a large extent outweighs the high cost of installation. It is both beautiful and durable and is obtainable in a wide variety of marbled and plain colours. Heavy traffic is suitable for rubber as the flooring maintains itself by expansion and contraction. If it is little used it tends to crack and oxidise. It needs to be protected from heavy weights and furniture should be fitted with gliders of a size proportionate to its weight.

Concrete makes a good sub-floor and the rubber should be laid in large continuous sheets as smaller sizes tend to come away from the concrete. A rubber mastic cement is used for fixing to either wood or concrete surfaces.

Cleaning. Soft soaps containing free alkali or soap liquids containing oils, e.g. turpentine or pine oil, or pastes containing abrasives should not be used for cleaning rubber floors. Petrol, benzine, naphtha and paraffin attack the material and make it soft and sticky and may cause bleeding of colours. They may, however, be used to remove stains if they are quickly wiped off.

Before washing, loose dirt should be brushed away and then the floor may be washed preferably with a mop or cloth. The water should be changed frequently; whether warm or cold should be used depends on the type of cleanser. An excessive amount of water should never be used as it may creep between the joints of the flooring and affect its adhesion to the sub-floor. After washing the floor should be dried as quickly as possible as this improves the sheen. When mechanical washers are employed care should be taken to see that the machine is not too heavy or abrasive in action as this may open the joints in the floor.

Polishes containing organic solvents are detrimental to rubber. A wax emulsion polish should therefore be used. Polishing should be done in sections so that traffic is not suspended while the sections are drying, which takes 5-30 minutes depending on atmospheric conditions and the polish employed. Polish should be spread lightly with a clean cotton pad and not be rubbed into the floor. When the polished floor becomes dirty the loose dirt should be removed with a broom and the floor wiped with a cloth moistened with clean cold water. No cleaner should be used as this will remove the polish. Cleansers and polishes should always be of a type approved by the manufacturers of the flooring material.

Terrazzo

Terrazzo is made of granulated marble or granite mixed with either white, grey or coloured portland cement. It may either be laid on the spot or obtained in various pre-cast forms. It is inexpensive and durable but is non-resilient. Terrazzo is a suitable flooring for lobbies, operating theatres and wards. It has wide uses as a base or border for other types of flooring such as linoleum or rubber, which can be laid down on the central track of a terrazzo covered ward. If it is not well laid it is liable to crack.

Cleaning. A neutral soap solution should be used for cleaning. Acids and strong alkalis affect the surface.

Wooden Flooring

The more commonly used woods for flooring are oak and maple. Both have a good appearance and can be used either as planks of uniform width or as parquet blocks. The effective wearing depth of a block is only the depth from the surface to the uppermost portion of any keying or locking device. In B.S. 1187 this is specified as ¾ in. When it is laid the pores of the wood should be sealed and after sandpapering the surface treated with shellac or varnished, and stained. Careful maintenance is necessary to obtain the best life from wooden floors.

Cleaning. Sweeping with a hair broom followed by an oiled mop is an effective method of cleaning wooden floors. Scrubbing with warm water and soap is not recommended.

FUELS

Although the choice of fuels is at present restricted, in normal times the principal question in the choice of fuels for the hospital is whether the steam boilers are to be hand-fired, provided with mechanical stokers, or with automatic stokers. Each of these types of firing requires a different grade of coal, and the decision will be based on the capital cost of the equipment, relative prices of grades of coal and cost of stoking labour. Few hospitals need the attendance of more than one stoker at the boiler house at one time. Automatic and mechanical stoking do not enable the stoker to be dispensed with entirely for they are designed with the object of correctly distributing to the fire grate the fuel provided in order to eliminate the human element which can waste large quantities of fuel.

The size of the plant, working conditions and other specific factors needing individual assessment will determine the choice of hand firing, mechanical or automatic stoking. Anthracite or coke burning boilers of various types of the sectional pattern are general and are occasionally fitted with automatic stokers. Although automatic as regards temperature control, etc., they need attention for the removal of ashes and clinker and consequently need some skilled attention.

Oil firing during the war years was to some extent helped out by burning creosote and creosote pitch mixtures, non-automatic equipment was adapted to burn these fuels adequately. Automatic plants, however, have not so far been completely adapted to burn these fuels satisfactorily. Oil presents many advantages in that storage space needed is less than for solid fuels, also there is a general absence of dust and dirt associated with solid fuels, and plant can readily be adapted to meet fluctuating demands according to hospital conditions.

FUEL STORAGE SPACE REQUIREMENTS AND CALORIFIC VALUES

Fuel	Cu. ft. per ton	Calorific Value B.Th.U.s per lb.	Heat Stored in Therms per cu. ft.
Anthracite . .	40	14,500	8
Bituminous Coal	45	12,000	6
Coke	90	12,000	3
Oil	40	18,500	10

Solid Fuels

Solid fuels, coal and coke for example, are generally the most economical in relation to heat units available per unit of cost. Storage space, however, is an important consideration, and removal of waste provides another problem. Some labour costs must always be allowed for in estimating costs in spite of automatic stoking.

Automatic stoking and thermostatic control are important developments in the working of solid fuel boilers for they ensure ease of working, uniform temperatures and a saving of fuel.

Fuel Oil

Fuel oil is generally more expensive on the basis of heat units available per unit of cost than solid fuels. Except on large installations, little attention is required on this type of equipment and then at infrequent intervals. Equipment may be automatic, semi-automatic or hand-controlled. The usual operation method, however, is by thermostatic control governed by room and boiler temperatures.

Underground storage is usual, but must be at a reasonable level for supply to the burners either by pumps or gravity. Certain local authority requirements need to be fulfilled for oil storage. These are also necessary for insurance purposes.

Gas Firing

The use of gas firing appliances in hospitals is generally restricted to relatively small plants because the cost of gas is higher than for solid fuels. The advantage, however, is that there is no need for constant attention and labour charges are reduced. Thermostatic controls and other devices enable the plant to be operated almost automatically and waste reduced to a minimum. Gas firing is convenient for the heating of hot water radiators in isolated buildings such as clinics that are used only occasionally or at special times. Automatic controls can then be arranged so as to cut in the installations on the days and at the times required. Gas fired boilers can be obtained suitable for any size of installation.

Electricity

The relatively high cost of current has so far prevented the wide use of electricity in steam raising boilers for hospitals. Where electricity is available at low rates it has certain advantages and can present an economic method of heating. Steam raising boilers automatically controlled and consuming electricity direct from high-tension mains at 6,600 volts are practical units. They do not require any attention beyond occasional inspection and internal cleaning as control is completely automatic. Another advantage is the complete absence of a boiler house chimney and the dirt and dust associated with other fuels. Electricity at very low rates is generally restricted to certain hours of the day and even to months of the year. Hospital services in these circumstances could not be maintained at all times with high voltage electrode boilers.

The thermo-electric storage system on the other hand has the advantage that current may be taken under off-peak load conditions at very low rates and the heat derived from the boilers may be stored in suitable storage vessels so as to make the heating, hot water supplies and steam available throughout the day. The capital cost of these installations is high.

GAS

Supply

The position regarding the supply of gas is regulated by the Gas Regulation Act of 1920 and a minimum pressure in the mains of 2 ins. is imposed by the Acts of 1929, 1932, and 1934. Generally speaking, however, the working pressure is kept at 3 to 3½ inches. Supplies are always metered and unlike water companies the supply may be cut off after due notice if accounts are not paid. Gas is charged for on the basis of the therm. The gas authority is required to declare the calorific value per cubic foot of the gas it supplies.

Whilst generally speaking technical requirements are not laid down with regard to fittings, the suppliers endeavour to maintain services as far as possible themselves. There is a tendency, however, for internal services to be extended without any notification to the gas undertaking, and in consequence it may ultimately be found that the incoming main is inadequate. If substantial additions are planned it is always advisable to consult the gas authority before the work is begun. The service mains into premises are the property of the consumer and it is his responsibility to maintain them.

Definitions

Therm. The therm is a unit of heat value of 100,000 British Thermal Units. It is the unit by which gas is sold to the consumer under the provisions of the Gas Regulation Act, 1920, which provides that the calorific value of the gas has to be declared (under the previous method gas was charged for per thousand cubic feet). If the declared calorific value of the gas is 500 B.Th.Us. per cubic foot it follows that 200 cu. ft. will comprise one therm.

Service Pipe. The pipe between the authorities main and the cock or valve controlling the supply to the consumer. Sizes depend on the consumption of gas required, the length of run and pressure available and vary from 1 inch for a small house to 12 inches and more for larger institutions.

High Capacity Meters

Meters should not be fitted in proximity of cables or electrical apparatus and the main cock must be near its inlet and easy of access in case of fire. The present range of high capacity meters of 700, 1,200, 1,800, 3,000, 4,500, 6,000, 9,000 and 12,000 cu. ft. hour respectively are suitable for installation in larger buildings.

Gas Fires

With regard to the installation of gas fires Post War Building Study No. 6 recommends that if a gas fire is to be fitted on a floor not formed of fire-resisting material conforming with B.S. 476: 1932, a hearth or slab of incombustible material conforming with the standard should be laid flush with or on the floor. Points for portable heaters should be fitted with a tap of the bayonet fitting plug type complying with B.S. 570: 1934, or with a suitable safety device which has the approval of the gas authority.

GLASS

Specifications

When glass is ordered it should be stated that all glass is to be of the type, quality and substance specified. Glass should be described by the recognised trade name, thicknesses and qualities, because of the wide variety of types manufactured.

Types of Glass

Sheet Glass. As sheet glass is a fire-finished product the two surfaces are never perfectly flat or parallel, which accounts for a certain amount of distortion of vision. These properties affect its uses and it is generally specified only where window openings are designed to take small panes (4 to 5 ft. super).

THICKNESSES

18 oz. (approx. 1/12″)	26 oz. (approx. ⅛″)
24 oz. (approx. 1/10″)	32 oz. (approx. 5/32″)

Polished Plate Glass. This type of glass is recommended where clear undistorted vision is required and the exterior appearance of a building is under consideration. The two surfaces are ground, smoothed and polished with the object of making the two surfaces parallel to provide undistorted vision. The normal thickness for glazing, ¼ inch, is approximately three times as strong as the normal sheet glass 24 oz. used for windows. It also gives higher sound insulation. Three qualities are available GG for ordinary glazing, S.G. for selected glazing and S.Q. for silvering quality.

Armourplate. This is a suitable glass for partitions in children's wards and mental hospitals as clear vision is provided with the additional safety factor inherent in this type of glass. It is manufactured from clear polished plate glass by a technique of heating and sudden cooling which results in a strong compression in the two outer surfaces with tension in the centre. If broken it is said to disintegrate into innumerable small pieces not sharp enough to cause serious injury. It also has great resistance to sudden temperature changes.

SIZES AND THICKNESSES

Thickness	Length	Width
3/16″	51″	25″
¼″	70″	52″
5/16″, ⅜″	82″	70″
½″	82″	70″
⅝″	70″	52″
¾″ ⅞″ 1″ 1½″ } available up to 8 sq. ft.

Wired Glass. This type of glass is approximately ¼ in. thick and has a fine wire mesh embodied in the middle and is useful for safety purposes and is fire resistant. There are two types, translucent and transparent.

The translucent types are Georgian Wired Cast which is reinforced with fine ½ in. square mesh wire electrically welded at the intersections: Wired Cast which is reinforced with ⅞ in. hexagonal mesh wire and Wired Arctic a figured rolled glass with a ⅞ in. hexagonal mesh wire. These types are used for roofs and wherever additional protection is needed.

The transparent types are used in public buildings for windows, doors, etc., wherever clear vision is required together with additional protection. The types are Polished Georgian Wired reinforced with ½ in. square mesh wire electrically welded at the intersections and Polished Wired reinforced with ⅞ in. hexagonal meshed wire.

Prismatic Glass. This is a translucent rolled glass of which one surface is comprised of prisms arranged to refract passing light in a desired direction according to the incidence of light. The other surface is flat. Three angles of prism are made, the first for where the angle of light incidence from the horizontal is up to 30°, the second for angles between 30° and 40°, and third for angles over 40°. It is useful for glazing windows which are overshadowed by neighbouring buildings. It is made in only one quality in sizes up to 60 in. high by 100 in. wide with the prisms running with the width of the sheet.

Cathedral. This is a translucent rolled glass one surface of which has a texture or pattern for use in bathrooms, kitchens, lavatories, etc. The sizes are 100 in. to 120 in. by 36 in. to 42 in. The normal thickness is ⅛ in., but 3/16 in. and ¼ in. are also available in some types.

Vita Glass. This type of glass which permits the passage of ultra-violet rays is obtainable in clear sheet of 1/10 in. thickness, also Cathedral and Georgian Wired.

Toughened Lenses. The use of toughened lenses is in roof and vertical panel lights and in all types of reinforced concrete construction where light transmission is required. The lenses which are 6 in. square by 2 in. thick have the same characteristics as armour-plate glass and are claimed to expand if broken and so exert a lateral thrust thereby maintaining their position. For this reason they are said to provide an effective fire barrier.

Glass Blocks. These are translucent units made in two halves and sealed together. They are claimed to be good for thermal insulation, sound insulation and to be fire resistant. Their use is for external or internal walls, staircase lights, panels, bays, partitions and wherever light is required with privacy. The brick sizes are 5¾ in. by 5¾ in. by 3⅞ in., several types of corner bricks are available.

HEATING

(See also Ventilation)

The generally agreed temperature necessary for comfort in hospital wards is 65°F and in domestic parts of buildings around 60°F. and these temperatures should be available when the outside temperature falls as low as 28°F. The maintenance of an adequate internal temperature is dependent upon the method of ventilation, the rate of air change and rate of loss of conducted heat from the building. The general practice in hospitals is to make allowance in designing a heating system for the complete change of air three times an hour (except in special areas, e.g. operating theatres, etc. for which the requirements are tabulated below). Insulation against heat loss from the building is another vital requirement for two reasons, first reduction in running costs and second the economising of fuel supplies.

Insulation

The structural insulation of buildings against heat loss is of great importance now that the national fuel resources must be conserved and the greatest heating value obtained from a smaller quantity of fuel than has been available in the past. It has been estimated that between 75 and 80 per cent. of all heating to maintain comfortable temperatures in a building is required to make good the loss of heat through walls, floors and roofs. The estimated addition to the structural cost of a building with efficient structural insulation is about 3 per cent.

There are three ways of heat transmission, radiation, conduction and convection. Radiation loss is prevented by fitting a smooth and bright aluminium foil to reflect back radiant heat. Conduction of heat is slowed down by using a thin quantity of insulating material (heat will be conducted through a nine inch brick wall approximately three times as fast as through one inch of good insulating material).

In Post-War Building Study No. 19 are suggested maximum values of thermal transmittance. Detailed figures on the thermal transmittance values of various types of building materials will be found in The Computation of Heat Requirements for Buildings. (The Institution of Heating and Ventilating Engineers.)

Methods of Heating

To attain the required temperatures in all units of the hospital the only practical method is some centralised installation. In England hot water is generally accepted as the most satisfactory method. In America, on the other hand, steam appears to be preferred because of the greater fluctuations in temperature and the fact that steam being at 212°F. has a greater store of heat immediately available for the rapid raising of indoor temperature. In England, even with low pressure of vacuum steam heating the surface temperature of the heating unit is relatively high and leads to a drying of the atmosphere. Another disadvantage of some steam systems is that they are liable to be noisy.

With buildings more than 75 ft. in height a difficulty arises, however, with hot water installations as the static pressure in the pipes (0.434 lbs. per foot of height) requires far more solid and robust construction than for steam and is in consequence more expensive.

There are two principal methods of heating by hot water, first, heating coils embedded in the plaster of ceilings and walls (the invisible panel system) using the principle of radiation to heat the building, and secondary heating units generally known as radiators using the principle of convection.

Invisible panel system.—The great advantage of this system is that it is entirely hidden in the walls and ceilings beneath the plaster, thereby adding greatly to the appearance of wards in the absence of visible pipes and heating apparatus. In 1938, the British Hospitals Association published the results of a survey carried out in hospitals using this system of heating and the main advantages brought to light were: floor and wall space left free from obstruction, less labour in cleaning and less chance of cross infection due to convection currents. Lack of heated surfaces on which dust can settle and the resulting drop in redecoration costs owing to lack of convection currents blackening the walls were interesting points.

It was found that over a period of twenty years there had been no failures of embedded coils where mild steel piping had been used and cracking was limited to the paint film, except where unsuitable plaster had been used. There was no reason to suspect internal corrosion or scaling as there is no evaporation or replacement of water in the coils.

Radiator Systems.—The radiator system has an advantage in being quicker in bringing about desired temperatures as it works by convection and heating the entire body of the air. In new constructions it is possible to conceal a large measure of the pipework, but in general it is not advised because it is difficult of access for repairs and maintenance.

Hot Water Heating Temperatures.—The recommended operating temperatures for invisible panel systems is not above 130°F. as above this figure trouble is met with the plaster ceiling coils and the radiant effect becomes unduly fierce.

Hospital pattern radiators are found in practice to operate successfully at not more than 150°F. and preferably not more than 140°F. as this gives a reasonable margin. In very cold weather the circulating water temperature can be raised to 160°F. At temperatures above this unnecessarily high local temperatures are caused and a certain amount of drying of the air.

Space Heating.—For temporary buildings, out-patient departments, waiting rooms and areas of the hospital not connected to the central hot water or steam heating system some form of electrical space heating may be found suitable. The common feature of this type of heater is that the heat (which emanates from "black" elements) circulates according to the principles of convection and is distributed equitably through the room. Some of these heaters embody the principle of radiation as well being panels which fit on the centre of a wall. Apart from radiant heat from the heating panel, hot air is circulated quickly and the room is rapidly raised in temperature and then subsequently the degree of heating may be reduced by half.

* These figures are published by kind permission of the Institution of Heating and Ventilating Engineers, and appear in its publication The Computation of Heat Requirements for Buildings.

Heating Special Departments

Operating Theatres.—It will be seen from the chart given above of temperatures for various units of the hospital, that 80°F. is required in the operating theatre. Although this temperature may not always be required it must be attainable. A heating system maintaining this temperature must be associated with an adequate ventilation system otherwise unsatisfactory conditions will result. A suitable mechanical ventilating plant is therefore necessary. Until recently steam has been favoured because of the short time in which the required temperature can be reached, but perhaps hot water panel systems are preferable where theatres are in constant use because as has been stated above there is less likelihood of the atmosphere being dried too much.

These considerations as well as questions of appearance and cleanliness have recently led to the adoption of complete air-conditioning plants. Fresh air drawn from the outside atmosphere through suitable filters, and if necessary warmed by passing it over a heating element, is introduced into the theatre by means of an electrically-driven fan through ducts at the top of the theatre opposite the north light window. An extract fan operating at a slightly lower rate enables the pressure inside the theatre to be maintained slightly above that prevailing outside so that vitiated air is not drawn in through windows and under doors, but warm fresh air under pressure forced out at these places. Humidity control does not appear necessary in the United Kingdom.

Premature Babies Rooms.—Temperatures of 80°F. to 85°F. are required in premature baby rooms where the temperature very often needs to be controlled within very fine limits, as little as 2°F. variation. Humidifiers are also needed. As the size of these rooms is generally small extensive mechanical equipment is not required and electrical methods are satisfactory as they are flexible and capable of very accurate control.

X-Ray Rooms.—Although the temperature required in deep therapy rooms is not so high (65°F.) as required in operating theatres, heating is best provided by warm air inlet and extracted by electric fans as suggested in air conditioning for operating theatres.

Open Air Wards.—In open air wards in sanatoria, generally speaking the head and upper portions of the patients most need keeping warm therefore some form of radiant heating is suggested. Surface panel radiators on the wall or ceiling appear to be satisfactory. Suitable electric diator panels would also meet thtse needs.

INTERNAL COMMUNICATIONS

Telephones

Planning

The first decision to be made in planning an internal telephone system in a hospital is whether a Post Office installation should be used for both internal and external calls, or, alternatively, two systems should be used, one for internal calls only, the other for both internal and external calls.

The Post Office and the telephone manufacturers both supply manual or automatic internal systems, of all sizes. An automatic system is more expensive in itself, but is likely to be economical in that it saves operating staff and gives a quicker service. Manual systems may be economical in temporary buildings or where service is required during limited hours ; they may also have advantages if calls to and from the public exchange system are much more frequent than internal calls. For ordinary hospitals automatic systems are likely to be preferable, since a quick service throughout the twenty-four hours is needed and the ratio of internal calls to external calls is comparatively high. A survey was carried out a few years ago on the telephone needs of 200 hospitals large and small, and the conclusion reached was that out of every 100 calls 85 were found to be purely internal and 15 external. In the same survey it was found that on the average 2 per cent. of the extensions were needed for external calls only, 78 per cent. for internal use only, and 20 per cent. for both internal and external calls.

Automatic Systems

Automatic systems fall, broadly speaking, under two heads ; the direct calling or multiple cable systems, and systems working from central switching equipment. Either type requires a small manually operated switchboard to handle incoming calls from the public system (outgoing calls to the public system can generally be put through automatically) except in the case of duplicate systems not providing for outside calls.

Direct Calling

Direct calling systems consist of two or more instruments each of which is fitted with the same number of selectors (buttons or keys) as the number of extensions. Each instrument is thus its own small self-contained exchange. All the instruments are connected by means of multiple cable. A 20-line installation will need 20 buttons on each instrument and a 25-way cable. These systems are limited to small installations, and are uneconomical for serving scattered points, or for buildings in which frequent changes of wiring may be necessary because of the high cabling costs.

There are two small systems of this type that can be rented from the Post Office; one provides for one exchange line and up to five extensions, the other two exchange lines and up to ten extensions. These can, of course, be used for both internal and external calls.

Switching Installations

For larger automatic installations the switching system must be used, in which the bulky cabling of the direct calling system, interconnecting all the telephones, is replaced by individual wiring from each extension to the central automatic apparatus. An ordinary dial telephone is provided, and calls are obtained by dialling the required extension number. On systems provided by the Post Office the extension can, if required, dial straight through to the public exchange, and the dial may have either numbers only or letters and numbers according to the type of public exchange to which the installation is connected. The central automatic equipment is generally arranged so that the installation can be increased in size without recabling if additional extensions are required, and the system is therefore much more flexible than a multiple cable system of the direct calling type.

The terms under which internal telephone systems are supplied vary, and should be scrutinised carefully when the costs of various types are being examined. If the ultimate size of the installation is unlikely to exceed 50 extensions an automatic system can be obtained on rental terms from the Post Office. For larger installations to be used for outside calls as well as internal the equipment must be bought from an approved contractor by agreement with the Post Office: the Post Office will in this event supply the wiring and telephones, and maintain the whole system. The agreement with the Post Office for either small or large system will be for a period of five years. If a purely internal system is to be used, in addition to a Post Office system (manual or automatic) for outside calls, this must be obtained from a telephone contractor, who will generally maintain it. The terms of the agreement, and the period for which it will run, vary from contractor to contractor. Rental and outright purchase should be compared with care, since although it may be generally true to say that rental terms are preferable for a short period and purchase for a long period, it is not possible to lay down any hard and fast rules, and the decision must depend on the circumstances of the particular case; the quality of maintenance and the danger that purchased equipment may become obsolete over a period of years must in particular be borne in mind.

Automatic Facilities

The facilities given by various automatic systems also differ a good deal. All such systems maintained by the Post Office can provide for outside or exchange calls as well as internal calls; exchange calls can be barred on any extension as required. Access to the public network for outgoing calls is given by direct dialling; incoming calls are handled by the switchboard attendant, who puts them through to the required extension. With the latest type of equipment an incoming call can be held while the extension user, by means of a press button on his telephone, makes a call to another extension for enquiry, etc.; the extension user can then return to the incoming call and either complete it or arrange for its transfer to another line (on some types the transfer can be made automatically).

Automatic systems without access to the public exchange offer additional facilities not at present provided by the Post Office. Certain extensions can be fitted with a priority call system, which enables a principal to get through even though the extension required may be already engaged. Loudspeakers can also be fitted to extensions where it is essential that both hands should be free while the call is in progress; the loudspeaker or handset may then be used at will, the lifting of the latter automatically cutting off the loudspeaker and permitting speech to be received only in the handset receiver. Staff and code calling as well as fire alarm facilities are possible on these systems. The facilities are useful, but may not outweigh the disadvantages of having duplicated telephones and wiring.

Although, generally, an automatic system (Post Office or private) is likely to be the best for hospitals there are at present difficulties in obtaining this type of equipment. The Post Office and the telephone manufacturing industry are playing a very full part in the national export drive, and the success with which British telephone equipment can be sold overseas has led to a severe curtailment of the amount available for the home market, whether for private installations or for Post Office exchanges. It may, therefore, be necessary to arrange for the installation of manual systems as a temporary measure until automatic systems (whether connected to the public network or not) become more readily available.

Staff Location Systems

Staff location and signalling systems fall into two major categories, those which call only one place at a time and are in consequence equivalent to telephones but not so efficient, and those where several stations are called simultaneously. Of the latter method there are three types of signal, lights or indicators and bells or buzzers, also loudspeakers. Installations using all three of these types of signal in combination have been made in hospitals.

Types of System

There are three types of system employing sound and visual signals in common use for staff location which may be used in the hospital from a central station by matron, doctors or other senior officials. The signals are generally originated from the telephone operator's switchboard.

(1) Systems using a single lamp or buzzer at each signal point. These employ code signals similar to morse, necessitating the allocation of a code signal to each person who may be called. This is generally restricted to where few code signals are required. Although audible signals are more likely to attract attention, visual signals are more likely to find favour in the hospital for reasons of silence.

(2) Systems employing two, three but not more than four lamps at each signal point. These have coloured lights or illuminated stencils which may be operated in various combinations. This again necessitates the allocation to each person of a special combination, and the number of combination signals is dependent on the number of lamps included in the signal unit.

(3) The electro-magnetic indicator system. One type consists of a pointer rotating round a dial with numbers on it each number corresponding to a person to be called. A similar system can be incorporated in the electric clocks.

Before a staff location system is installed immediate and eventual requirements should be ascertained so that plans can be drawn up showing the type of installation, the accommodation required and the chases and conduits required. A British Standard code of practice on Staff Location Systems is in course of preparation.

Patient to Nurse Systems

There is another special application of staff location in the hospital, the installation of some method of patient to nurse communication or a nurse call system. There are three basic principles, signal lights, buzzers or bells and loudspeakers, also systems employing all three in combination.

Signal Light System. In the signal light system indicators can be placed wherever the nurse is likely to be, duty room, dispensary, ward kitchen, etc. These lights register the call and show which ward is calling. In the ward itself a lamp tells the patient that his signal has been registered, while the pressure of a button when the call has been answered extinguishes all signal lights.

This type of system always has the advantage of completely silent working with the minimum disturbance of patients. There is, however, the disadvantage that the light signals can only be placed in a certain number of positions and they cannot always be seen by the nurse. In large institutions if the nurse is required by the sister she may need to telephone to receive the instructions.

Bells or Buzzer. Although bell and buzzer systems cannot fail to be noticed and have the advantage of getting round corners from which light signals are not visible they have the great disadvantage of being irritating to the nerves and increasing the noises of the hospital when every effort has been made to keep the institution as quiet as possible. Both this system and the light system have the disadvantage that the requirements of the patient need first to be found out before any action can be taken and may entail much unnecessary walking or telephoning for instructions.

Loudspeaker Systems. Loudspeaker systems can be in the form of either a two-way loudspeaker or a patient to nurse microphone and loudspeaker. One type enables the patient to speak after pressing down a switch which interrupts the wireless programme in the nurses' room and the patient's message is relayed in its place. Provision is also made for automatic light signals to be given both in the nurses' room control board and outside the patient's room. A buzzer can also be sounded when the switch is pressed upwards if a nurse is urgently required.

The second type provides two-way conversations, signal lights both outside the patient's room and at the master station, and the sounding of a buzzer at the control as well. Calls can be accumulated if more than one patient calls and answers in rotation. An earphone for private conversations, cutting out the loudspeaker, can also be used.

Finally, there is another system which has been installed as a result of an analysis of the calls in the above system where out of 4,000 calls from patients only 5 per cent. required an answer from the nurse. This is one giving verbal communication from patient to nurse only. When the patient switches on the microphone the same switch lights a signal lamp in each ward connected with the system and warns other patients that a microphone is in use. When the lamp is extinguished the circuit immediately becomes available again.

LAUNDRY

Organisation. It is impossible to lay down hard and fast rules for guidance regarding plant lay-out as buildings and requirements differ even when an entirely new plant is under consideration. Advice, however, can be obtained from the British Launderer's Research Association or any reputable firm of laundry engineers.

The main point to be borne in mind is that broken continuity means work standing still, so work should be kept on the move. The following are the sections of the laundry in order of the flow of work in a system of "straight through flow."

Reception. The reception area should be a separate room or a clearly defined area and must be definitely maintained as such. A speedy sorting and checking flow cannot be established if sorters do not know where to find loads.

Sorting Section. Every article processed should pass through here and be counted and tabulated. The sorting room should be controlled by a person who has adequate experience of checking linen in all its phases. Speed and accuracy are essential. Classifying of any doubtful articles should be done in conjunction with the chief washroom employee.

Washing. The washroom should control the rate of flow through the plant itself and washing capacity required should be ascertained and kept up to date. This includes all processes for soiling and stain removal, also hydroing.

Drying. All drying processes should be included in this section whether by continuous dryers, drying tumblers or static drying rooms, but not as is sometimes thought "airing off" after ironing.

Calendering. On the calendering machine itself six points require constant control :—

(1) The correct steam pressure for bed(s) and roller(s).
(2) The correct size inlets for steam.
(3) Efficient steam trapping for condensate from bed(s) and roller(s).
(4) Regular operation of air vents and by-passes on condensate lines.
(5) Strict attention to clothing on rollers.
(6) Operating speed in accordance with the prevailing conditions.

Pressing and Ironing. Presses are gradually finding favour with hospital laundries and are a necessity for speedier output with less staff and with proper control will considerably reduce operating and processing costs.

Packing. Packing is of vital importance as it can impede the flow of the whole plant. As there is a steady flow of articles through the calender so there should be a steady flow of articles being classified.

Despatch. As with reception a definite area or room should be allocated under strict control to ensure correct return of all work to its source of origin.

Essentials of Good Washing

A satisfactory definition of good washing is the thorough removal of soiling substances from fabrics without causing damage. These factors need to be considered carefully if this is to be achieved. (1) Attention must be paid to steam and water supplies; (2) washing machine operation; and (3) use of suitable detergents.

Water and Steam

Water, to be best suited for laundries, should be softened to within 2° of zero hardness and should be available in ample quantities. A plentiful hot water supply at not less than 160°F. is also required. Steam supply should be dry and at a pressure sufficient to bring to the boil in five minutes the contents of a washing machine filled with hot water to a cage dip of 5 ins. Piping of hot and cold water and steam to each machine is an essential.

Hard water should not be used for rinsing, because although lather is killed quicker, it leaves some of the soap in the work as lime soap and may give rise to black specks in the work and the need for re-washing with consequent extra expense.

Hot water is necessary to enable washing and rinsing to be done speedily. This avoids undue rubbing of the work and reduces overhead costs by increasing the daily output of the machines, for expensive delay can be caused by heating water in the machine from cold for later washes.

Operation of washing machines

To guide the operator dip gauges and thermometers are essential for efficiency of working a washing machine. The dip gauge should be marked to show the maximum depth of fluid in the cage of the machine, i.e. the inner perforated cylinder into which the work is loaded. Monthly checks of dip gauges should be carried out by comparing the gauge reading with various depths of water measured by a ruler.

Laundry thermometers are usually of the mercury in steel or vapour types; for efficient working it is necessary for them so to be placed that wash and rinse liquors flow round them freely. They should be checked once a month against one of the mercury in glass or alcohol varieties and should give readings within 5°F. of the true temperature.

White Work

It has been suggested that although many institution laundries give white work (sheets, pillowslips, towels, white coats, aprons and print shirts, etc.) only one wash lasting about 30 minutes during which time the water is raised from lukewarm to boiling, the more efficient method of dirt removal is to give work two or three short washes at rising temperatures. This method removes the dirt in stages and it is claimed practically eliminates the danger of redepositing dirt on the load. If adequate steam and water supplies are available this method takes no longer than the old method.

A suitable formula for white work is :—

Operation	Dip in.	Temp. Deg. F.	Time Min.	Supplies
Break-wash	5	110	10	Soap and builder
Wash	5	150	10	,, ,,
Boil ..	4	200	15	,, ,,
Rinse	10	160	5	—
Rinse	10	130	5	—
Rinse	10	100	5	—
Rinse	10	70	5	(Blue)

The above times include time for draining and filling the machine, assuming supplies of hot water and steam are adequate. Drainage times of half a minute after washes and one minute after rinses are generally adequate. For radially divided D. and Y. machines these times may have to be slightly increased. One essential point, however, is to maintain an adequate lather throughout all washing operations in order to maintain in suspension dirt removed from the load.

Bleaching

A bleach will be necessary to remove many common stains like tea, coffee, etc., which will be left after using the above formula, although it is satisfactory in most cases except for heavily soiled white work. If bleach is properly used there is little to fear from loss of strength in the fabrics. In addition to removing most stains the commonest laundry bleach (sodium hypochlorite) has a very effective germicidal action, a very important factor in the hospital laundry.

Sodium hypochlorite, the commonest bleach, is usually supplied as an aqueous solution with its strength quoted in available chlorine content (usually 14 per cent.). It is often sold under brand names. The correct amount to use is from 6 to 12 ozs. of the 14 per cent. solution per 100 lbs. of load, depending on the amount of staining of the work. The upper limit of 12 ozs. per 100 lbs. of work should never be exceeded. Strong bleach should be diluted in a pail of cold water before use. The first rinse is the most effective time to use bleach and the above rinsing should be modified as given in the table below.

Thorough rinsing is essential because irritation of the skin can be caused by alkaline substances left in the finished work, also yellowing of white work during ironing.

Rinse ..	7	160	10	Bleach
Rinse ..	10	130	5	—
Rinse ..	12	100	5	—

Standard Loadings of Machines

Overloading of machines reduces the amount of agitation to which the work is subjected and prevents the production of good washing. Three-and-a-half pounds per sq. ft. is the generally accepted maximum desirable for most metal machines doing white work and three pounds per sq. ft. for wooden machines.

STANDARD LOADINGS

Cage Dimensions Diam. In.	Length In.	Dry Load lb.

34 ×	72	130
42 ×	84	235

Woollen and Silk Articles

Gentler methods are needed to wash woollens and silks than those for linens and cottons. Dips should be increased to 10 ins. for all washes and the wash temperature should not exceed 100°F.

Operation	Dip in.	Temp. Deg. F.	Time Min.	Supplies
Wash ..	10	100	10	Soap
Wash ..	10	100	10	Soap
Rinse ..	12	100	5	—

Rinse ..	12	80	5	—

The above formula is suitable for most woollens and silks. Excessive rubbing should be avoided as this causes " felting." Machines of small diameter, 34 ins. maximum, are recommended. Pure soap only should be used as very alkaline wash liquors tend to yellow wool.

Soaps in the Laundry. (See also Water Softening)

The temperature in degrees centigrade at which fatty acids solidify is called the titer of a soap. Low titer soaps (under 25 deg. C) dissolve readily in lukewarm water. High titer soaps (over 35 deg. C) however, need hot water for preparing the solutions. The lather for high titer soaps can be maintained during a boil whereas low titer soaps do not give a stable lather in hot water.

Soaps for laundry purposes are usually purchased in flake or powder form, the flake soaps containing approximately 88 per cent. of pure soap and the powdered types about 92 per cent. One of the advantages of flakes and powder over the bar form, quite apart from the latter's high water content (approximately 30 per cent.), is that owing to their greater surface area per lb. they dissolve far more easily. Care should be taken not to buy a soap powder containing little real soap and a large amount of soda, for although dry to the touch it has a large water content and is consequently uneconomical.

As the initial soap operation in the laundry process is usually carried out at temperatures between 100°F. and 120°F. in order to avoid the coagulation of albuminous materials—blood or pus for example, and to avoid the setting of fruit stains, soap used in the break must be of the low titer type. The same applies for woollens and silks or fabrics with fugitive colours. For cottons and linens, however, a higher titer soap is necessary as the temperatures for hot suds operations are considerably higher, 160-200°F.

Soapless Detergents

Many varieties of soapless detergents have been developed in recent years which are suitable for use in the laundry. Among these are some which are in no way dependent for manufacture on natural fats and are manufactured from a by-product of petrol refining, and after a chemical process the resulting product is a mixture of the sodium salts of the corresponding secondary alkyl sulphates. This type of product is claimed to be most effective in low temperature washes such as for woollens and coloured cloths, and can be used without any loss of efficiency in hard water.

LIFTS

In the hospital there is the nature of the traffic to be taken into consideration, with regard to lift installation. Cars may be required to deal with stretchers and also the attendants, beds, wheel-chairs or other cumbersome articles, consequently an internal car size of 7 ft. × 3 ft. is desirable with 6 ft. 8 ins × 2 ft. 6 ins. as an absolute minimum. For normal passenger traffic the space required per passenger is estimated at 1¾ to 2½ sq. ft.

There is a wide choice among available makes and each maker has his own method of achieving controls and designs to suit specific hospital needs. With bed lifts the important considerations are : smooth starting and stopping, not too rapid acceleration, and that it should be as silent in operation as possible both with regard to the motor and the doors and gates.

Regarding speed it is suggested that about 150 ft. per minute is the most suitable for bed lifts, but for staff and passengers about 200 ft. per minute appears to be adequate where the building is limited to two or three floors.

Control Methods

The internal push button method from within the car appears the most suitable method of control for hospital purposes as the lift can then be used by anyone day or night and few hospitals are in a position to need a full time lift attendant. Care must be taken to see that locking arrangements are adequate and that once the car has started its journey all gates are automatically locked and the car cannot be intercepted on an intermediate floor.

METALS

Definitions

Drawn Metal. The process of drawing cold sheet or strip metal through a die by tension. It is possible to work a wider range of metals by this method than by extrusion. The metals used are also generally thinner than those used in the extrusion method.

Electro-Plating. The method of depositing metal or metal alloys for decorative or protective purposes on another metal by means of electric current. Metals which can be electrolytically deposited in this way are cadmium, chromium, copper, gold, nickel, silver, tin and zinc. Iron and steel are often protected from rusting in this way by zinc or cadmium.

Extruded Metal. The process of heating and forcing a non-ferrous metal, by pressure, through a die. An extremely wide range of shapes can be produced by this method.

Characteristics and Uses

ALUMINIUM

Aluminium is the lightest metal in normal use, having a specific gravity of 2.71. It has many uses in the hospital, among these are kitchen equipment and as kicking plates on doors, furniture fittings and in various sheet applications. The protective action of a spontaneously forming oxide on the surface of this metal renders it highly resistant to atmospheric corrosion particularly in indoor atmospheres. It is, however, attacked readily by some corrosives. The wrought alloys of aluminium need to be divided into two categories: (1) those which obtain their maximum mechanical properties by heat treatment; and (2) those which are not susceptible to heat treatment and which harden by working. A very wide range of alloys is used, many of which have been developed for specific purposes such as marine work and aircraft. Nickel, manganese, copper, silicon, magnesium and even chromium and titanium are all used to impart special qualities. Anodic oxidisation increases its resistance to corrosion considerably, but provides a matt surface; this coating may be dyed any colour, on the other hand it can be either opaque or transparent.

It is obtainable in several forms: forged, sheet and plate and extruded. Forged aluminium can be used for door furniture and fasteners—also for casement stays.

Sheet and plate are the finished material from the process of hot and cold rolling from a cast ingot. This material can be used for roofing, duct systems, guttering, casings and panelling. Extruded sections are fine in texture, with uniform density and can be produced in almost any shape.

COPPER

This metal, owing to its resistance to corrosion, has an almost unlimited life. The familiar greyish green colour of copper roofs which is acquired by this metal on exposure to the weather is its own oxide protection. The bright metal although it may take some years to acquire this skin of oxide does not require any further protection from corrosion. Copper has an extremely wide range of applications. In sheet or strip form it can be used for roofing and parapet gutters. Other uses are: flashings, eaves, gutters, down pipes, damp proof courses, tanks, cylinders, lightning conductors and even as a facing to plywood. In tubing and pipe form it can be used for hot and cold water systems, radiators, panel and convection heating systems, ventilating pipes, and electrical purposes.

CORRUGATED IRON

Sheet lengths of corrugated iron vary from 4 feet to 12 feet, but the normal maximum length is generally 10 feet. The sheets are made a definite number of corrugations in width and in the heavier sheets vary from 3 to 5 inches per corrugation. The thickness is measured in Birmingham Wire Gauge and for better class work the thicker sheets 16 to 18 B.W.G. are used. For ordinary purposes 20-24 B.W.G. is adequate and the lightest 28 B.W.G. is only used for temporary purposes. The sheets need to be fixed to roofs by special hooked bolts. The normal overlap allowed is one corrugation for the sides and about six inches for the end lap.

STAINLESS STEEL

Stainless steel owes its stainless properties to the presence of chromium as an alloy, the greater the content of chromium the more resistant it is to corrosion. Surgical instruments are made from steel containing about 14 per cent. of chromium. This type of steel can be hardened to provide a perfectly satisfactory cutting edge. It can also be hardened and tempered to give the combination of toughness and spring required in other types of instruments. Bowls, beakers, jugs, cans, pans, sterilisers, tables, lockers, trolleys and operating tables are produced from a type of steel containing 18 per cent. of chromium and about 8 per cent. of nickel. This has been found very strong and highly-resistant to corrosives.

The resistance to corrosion of stainless steel is closely bound up with the properties of an invisible oxide film which grows spontaneously on the surface and can only be removed by chemical attack under conditions for which the use of stainless steel is not recommended.

Corrosive Reagents. Although stainless steel is safe to use with carbolic acid of any strength the manufacturers do not recommend it to be left in contact with hypochlorite solutions, particularly the acid type, for more than a few minutes at the time. Mercuric chloride solutions are other corrosive fluids and stainless steel is not recommended for use with them. Resistance to dilute iodine solutions is adequate under conditions of complete immersion, but if only partly immersed or should iodine drops be allowed to dry up, serious pitting may occur.

NURSING STAFFING STANDARDS

This subject is dealt with in a report Nursing Staff, Considerations on Standards of Staffing published by King Edward's Hospital Fund for London in 1945. This report deals fully with the factors to be taken into account when assessing staff requirements both for hospitals of all types where the main considerations are space and size of wards, the size of the domestic staff and the reserve of nurses to replace those on leave or sick, and in addition the special factors to be considered in training schools.

Ratio of Nurses to Patients

A survey was made by the committee, whose findings were embodied in the report, of the number of staff actually engaged at the time per hundred beds (sisters, trained staff nurses and student nurses) in a 700, 600, 400, 200, 145 and 112 bed hospital respectively, all of which were training schools. From the figures obtained, the number of nurses needed in each case to work a 96 hour fortnight was calculated. The actual hours worked under existing arrangements which varied from 95 per fortnight to 132 per fortnight, was the basis for the calculation. The ratios obtained varied considerably from 65 nurses to 100 beds down to 48 per 100 beds. But it was considered that even at the hospitals with the highest ratios the numbers were insufficient to meet all requirements and the report suggested that a ratio of 70 ward nurses to 100 beds made up as follows might be considered by hospitals in the light of their individual requirements :—5 sisters, 5 trained staff nurses, 10 4th year student nurses, 50 1st to 3rd year student nurses.

Further information on this subject regarding its wider implications will be found in The Report of the Working Party on The Recruitment and Training of Nurses and also in The Minority Report of the Working Party.

OPERATING THEATRES— EXPLOSION RISKS

There is always the possibility of fire or explosion during the time that anaesthetics are being administered owing to the formation of explosive mixtures, and this makes essential the taking of special precautions in the operating theatre.

Main Causes of Explosions

There are four main causes of explosions, (1) the use of hot wire such as cauteries, (2) sparks at the contacts of, or breaks in, electrical equipment, (3) sparks caused by frictional electricity and (4)the possibility of defective action of high-pressure gas equipment.

Explosive Anaesthetic Mixtures

Explosions of anaesthetic vapours, having an electrical origin might often have been prevented had the electrical conditions of such ignition been known. The proportions of ether-oxygen and air within which ignition is possible vary with the type of source. With hot wires such as cauteries ignition can occur within limits as wide as 3 to 80 per cent. of ether in oxygen. With sparks in general, however, the limits are much narrower. Second only to hot wires as a possible risk are the fizzling sparks at a slow intermittent break of circuit between fine wires. When the current is kept below certain well-defined values ignition can always be prevented. Ether mixtures are particularly sensitive to the rise of voltage at break of circuit. At tests carried out before the war, it was found that when keeping the mixture of ether constant at 14 per cent. the least direct current that caused ignition at 50 volts was 0.65 amp., at 40 volts this rose to 2.75 amp., and at 30 volts ignition could only be obtained by currents well above 10 amp. The advantage of using low voltage apparatus can scarcely be exaggerated though clean breaks are not a likely source of ignition.

Conclusions Drawn from Experiments

(1) Cauteries or heated metals are highly dangerous when in contact with ether-oxygen or ether-air mixtures. Ether is too inflammable to be used in any proportions where there are possibilities of such ignition.

(2) The temperature of an inspection flash lamp bulb is far below danger limits.

(3) A local hot spot in the leads due to a broken wire, or a bad connection at lamp terminals, might be sufficient to cause ignition if they reach the critical temperature.

(4) Ignition by a.c. break sparks between fuse wires—or by broken wires—is always easier than by d.c. probably because of inductance. With a.c. there is no lower limit of voltage at which the risk of ignition is negligible.

(5) The use of small a.c. inspection lamps should be discouraged.

Buffer Resistances Required

The results of work on ignition sparks showed that the inherent or buffer resistances of the circuit and battery should be at least twice the limiting resistance shown in the following table :

R.M.S. voltage	Least igniting current, amperes.	Circuit resistance, ohms.	Ratio, d.c./a.c.
2	over 4.6	0	8
4	3.0	1.33	5.0
6	1.75	3.25	8.0
8	1.17	6.66	11.3
10	0.80	12.5	15.0

Further Precautions

To eliminate the risk of contact sparks all switches installed in the operating theatre should be of the sparkless type, consisting of a sealed contact tube containing mercury, operated by a semi-rotary movement. Otherwise gas tight housings should be used. Three pin interlocking type plugs, which prevent the withdrawal of the plug if the circuit is closed, should be used, and the switch controlling the outlet should also be of the sparkless type. All electric motors and control gear for fans, etc., should be placed outside the anaesthetic zone, but if voltage regulators are required in the theatre they should be pre-set and totally enclosed and flame proof as should all other electrical equipment which needs to be in the theatre.

Static Electricity

With regard to static electricity resulting from friction, this depends on the atmospheric conditions prevailing in the theatre, and although in this country the humidity of the atmosphere is generally sufficient to prevent the heavy build up of static, precautions should be taken.

Electrification of a frictional character can often be generated by the movement of dry fabrics such as the removal of a blanket from a patient or trolley and may result in dangerous electrification of equipment sufficient to produce a spark capable of igniting anaesthetic vapours. The risk becomes very small if the humidity is as high as 65 per cent. A warm blanket from a hot cupboard, however, may require a long time to attain hygrometric equilibrium with the surrounding atmosphere.

Trolleys and other equipment do not hold their charge long in a humid atmosphere, but any tendency for the air to become dangerously dry can be checked by reference to a wet and dry bulb thermometer and, if necessary, danger averted by air-conditioning.

All metal trolleys, stands, and so on, which are on metal insulated feet should be earthed at all times with brass or copper trailing chains screwed to the trolleys at two points. If the operating theatre is fitted with rubber flooring this should be of the conducting type. Trolley tyres could be of the same material.

PAINT AND PAINTING

Specifications

For the preservation of buildings regular painting is an essential. The importance of preparing proper specifications for work to be done needs to be emphasised. In new buildings the architect is responsible for paint specifications, but for later work and preservation different specifications will be necessary. This is because if the original work was not well done or too long a period has elapsed since re-painting, stripping will be necessary. If the paint work, however, was done well, rubbing down and stopping will take the place of stripping. If a different type of paint is used from the first time some modification in specification will anyway be necessary.

With regard to the specifying of paints in Post War Building Study, No. 5, which deals exhaustively with the whole subject of the painting of buildings, it is suggested that the framing of specifications is a difficult matter. After stressing that skill in preparation of the surface is as vital to good performance as the quality of paint used, the survey suggests the following alternative methods of specification as most likely to give satisfaction :

(1) Supply a list of not less than three proprietory brands of paint, known by experience or repute to be of the type required for the purpose. Paint should then be selected from this list and used in accordance with the manufacturers' directions. This places reliance on the reputation of the manufacturer—and every reliable firm regards its reputation as one of its most valuable assets.

(2) The purpose for which the paint is to be used should be specified. The paint must also be of the type recommended in P.W.B.S., No. 5, as suitable for that purpose, and that it shall be of ingredients which conform to the British Standards.

It is also suggested that once specifications have been adopted painters should be required to work to them and an inspection clause and examination of material clause should be included in the specification.

Purpose of Paint

Dependant on its correct application to the surface it is designed to protect, a suitable paint creates a durable film which is proof against atmospheric attack and other wear for some time. On interior surfaces paint should have satisfactory light reflection value. (See Artificial Lighting for reflection values of various surfaces.)

The most generally used paint is oil paint. Varnish has been in use for centuries and in recent years scientific research has made available several other varieties. The types available are oil paints, synthetic paints, varnishes, cellulose finishes and water paints.

Oil Paint

Oil paints are composed of a mixture of dry pigments ground in a medium of oil and sometimes varnish, and thinned to a suitable consistency with turpentine or mineral spirits. Pigments may consist of a wide range of substances including white lead, zinc oxide, titanium oxide, lead chromate, ultramarine or Prussian blue. These must not fade or change under exposure. Linseed oil is the most commonly used drying oil although Tung oil, also known as China wood oil, is another important oil used mainly for the preparation of hard gloss paints. Thinners, turpentine and in more recent years white spirit, are added to reduce the viscous consistency of the drying oil and make the paint easy to apply. As the paint would take three to four days to dry if made with linseed oil alone, small quantities of " driers " are added. These are compounds containing lead or cobalt and terebine which speed up the drying and make it possible to touch the paint with a few hours of application without disturbing the surface.

Flat finish paints can be obtained by adding turpentine or mineral spirits and reducing the proportion of linseed oil. The addition of varnish in the right proportion with the pigment will produce enamel, which also contains heat treated or boiled oil to make it spread better and give a finer finish and eliminate brush marks. Egg shell finish is a medium glaze between matt and glossy.

Synthetic Paints

Whereas natural oils or gums are uncontrolled products as regards actual quality, synthetic oils and gums can be standardised in manufacture and repeated with accuracy. These synthetic substances should not be taken as mere substitutes for the older varnishes but are claimed to provide rapid drying, long durability and high gloss. It should be added, however, that with the introduction of glyptal resins and other synthetic refinements paints can no longer be freely mixed, and nothing should be added to a synthetic paint except in accordance with the manufacturers instructions.

Where protection as opposed to appearance is the main requisite, the older types of paint are advantageous. For purely decorative purposes, however, synthetic paints may prove more satisfactory.

Varnishes

Varnishes are transparent and used to enhance the surface of a work. They differ from paint in containing no pigment or extenders. Natural resin is used in making varnish, it is melted and fused at a certain temperature and " cooked " with linseed oil. Driers are added with turpentine or white spirit. Synthetic resins have been introduced but these differ materially from the natural and have resulted in the production of new varnishes. With regard to finishes, the higher the proportion of linseed oil the more elastic and durable the varnish is, but the longer it takes to dry. A high resin content however gives a harder and more brilliant surface but is less durable and elastic.

Cellulose Paints

These paints differ from oil paints by virtue of drying entirely by the evaporation of a solvent, no chemical change is involved. The basic ingredient of cellulose varnishes is nitrocellulose a substance made from cotton. This is dissolved in a suitable solvent, together with plasticisers to give the required flexibility, and resins for hardness and adhesion. Cellulose enamel can be produced by the addition of pigment. The fact that drying is entirely due to evaporation of the solvent means that the film of paint retains its solubility and difficulties are experienced in its application unless it is sprayed. In practice cellulose paints are rarely used in buildings except for the decoration of prefabricated fittings.

Water Paints

These paints have been extensively developed during the war period and are of use both for interior wall work and the decoration of exterior stucco and concrete. These types of paint usually dry partially or wholly by the evaporation of water. The vehicle portion is usually casein, egg-white or glue. This type of paint was originally called distemper because the pigments were tempered or mixed with size—a water soluble vehicle.

Wood Preservatives

Creosote type preparations are the most generally used and are often employed as stains for new woodwork. N.B.—The use of creosote should be avoided on any surface which may subsequently have to be painted as it contains substances soluble in the medium of paint and will bleed through it and cause discoloration.

Frequency of Painting

According to a generally accepted estimate made a few years ago the cost of painting with a medium priced paint was made up of 4 units of cost for labour to one unit of cost for paint. Working on this basis with the present higher relative cost of labour nothing is to be saved by using cheap paint, for the longer a paint lasts the more the hospital will save.

Wards and other inside surfaces which are not subject to mechanical wear should not need repainting for seven years or more. The smoothness of the final surface is of importance, as when the walls are washed down any small protuberances will eventually be broken down and wear will start.

For exterior work lead paint is generally recommended and repainting will be required every six years. Exposed portions may have to be done more frequently. Synthetic paints should, however, be considered, particularly if favourable evidence can be obtained of their use in conditions similar to those in which they are required.

If the original coat is burnt off a wooden surface, the job must be treated with a suitable primer. Where the surface is already painted, two undercoats and one finishing coat will usually be sufficient.

Preparation of Surface

The preparation of surfaces before painting should be carried out with care. Smoothness is essential if a well-finished and hard-wearing result is to be obtained.

On woodwork all accumulated dirt should first be removed. Dampness is frequently a cause of trouble and woodwork should be allowed to dry out well if blistering is to be avoided. Any mould growths, which often appear on woodwork which has been allowed to get damp, should be carefully cleaned off and the wood sterilised. All holes must be made good with hard stopping. The use of glazier's putty is bad practice. Treatment of old paint surfaces depends on the state they are in. If they are bad they must be burnt off, or paint remover, made with powerful non-corrosive solvents, should be used. On surfaces which have disintegrated uniformly from the surface by "chalking" and which are free from cracking and peeling, rubbing down will provide a good surface for repainting. Wet rubbing is recommended with waterproof sandpaper. Home Office regulations forbid dry rubbing down of lead paints.

On metal the chief difficulty is rust. It is essential that every trace of rust be removed before any paint is put on a metal surface for if this is not done oxidisation will continue underneath the paint. If the general paint surface is in fair condition it should be looked over and any defects should be scraped down to the bright metal, it can then be repainted. If it is a bad surface complete stripping is essential.

With plaster surfaces and water painting dampness is once again, as with wood, the major trouble. In old buildings the walls will often be found to vary in porosity. If this is the case they should first be treated with a coat of priming liquid or other sealer for otherwise flaking is likely to ensue.

Cracking and Scaling

A paint surface is always under tension through expansion and contraction due to exposure to changes in temperature. In consequence the paint needs to be elastic in order for the various coats to expand and contract equally with the material to which they adhere. If this is not so or if paint is on wood which has shrunk, cracking will occur and may lead to peeling. Thin paint films are less likely to crack than thick as may occur when a surface has been repainted several times without wearing down. Hard inelastic undercoats should be avoided. If cracking recurs after repainting the only solution is to strip the surface completely instead of rubbing down.

Dampness

Dampness, as mentioned above, is the cause of blistering and flaking of paint. It is absolutely essential to let woodwork dry out before painting, for if blistering occurs the only remedy is stripping and repainting. Outside work should not be started too early in the morning as dew or mist may have left a layer of moisture on the surface to be painted.

Paint Economy

The economy recommendations on the use of paint in building, construction and maintenance issued in January, 1949, by the Ministry of Works to replace the former more severe economies set out in the Interim Economy Memorandum issued in September, 1946, have now also been withdrawn,

The recommendations however are printed below as they are of continuing interest in pointing out where certain economies can be made in painting expenditure.

"1. Paints containing linseed oil should not be used in maintenance work for repainting surfaces which, by cleaning or other reasonable treatment, can be restored to a condition appropriate to the purpose for which the room or building is about to be used.

2. Paints, or other treatments containing linseed oil should not be used on exterior surfaces, previously unpainted, of stone, brick, clay-block, concrete cement rendering or stucco.

3. Paints, or other treatments, containing linseed oil should not be used when re-painting surfaces previously treated with cement paints, silicate paints, bituminous paints or wood preservatives.

4. Bituminous or tar paints should be used wherever practicable on exterior iron and steel such as gates, railings, outbuildings, etc.

5. Wood preservatives, in place of paint, should be used wherever practicable on exterior woodwork such as weatherboards, bargeboards, gutterboards, outbuildings, etc.

6. Encouragement should be given to the use of stain and varnish, in place of paint, wherever practicable on interior woodwork such as doors, cupboards, architraves, picture rails, skirtings and staircases.

7. Cement paints, or silicate paints should be used where suitable, according to the type and purpose of the building, on interior surfaces of brick, concrete, cement rendering, asbestos-cement, lime plaster and insulating board."

British Standards

British Standards exist for paint material, i.e. drying oils, thinners, driers, pigments and extenders, colours of paints, oil paints and varnishes.

PLASTICS

Definition

The term plastics is applied to a widely differing range of products manufactured from synthetic resins, which are produced from either simple organic compounds (acetylene, formalin, etc.) or by chemically modifying organic materials such as cellulose from wood, and cotton, and cassein from milk which occur in nature. These products vary in properties from sticky syrups to brittle, tough or fibrous solids.

In most cases plastics are not cheap materials but the hospital administrator would do well to consider their specialised qualities when planning new layouts or expenditure on replacement of more conventional equipment.

Although there are many applications where the initial expenditure may be doubled or trebled if plastics are used it must be borne in mind that plastics may last ten times as long as other types of material.

Types of Plastics

Laminated Plastics (Constructional Materials). Constructional materials for partitions, wall surfaces, table surfaces, furniture, trolleys and so on are generally made from laminations. Laminated plastics are made by sticking together under great pressure large numbers of thin sections of material with a synthetic resin bonding agent, which process can be likened to the manufacture of plywood. The constituent layers are often only a few thousandths of an inch thick. The most widely employed materials include paper, any form of cloth or fabric, glass cloth and wood veneers. Safety glass where glass is laminated with bonding materials also falls into this category.

Properties. These products have the following qualities : in general they are strong and light. possess good chemical resistance, are unaffected by weather and will withstand extreme changes in climatic conditions. They are unaffected by bacteria, fungi and insects and may be obtained with highly polished and scratch-resisting surfaces with a wide range of colour and design. In addition they are good insulating material and are fire-resisting. They can, in most cases, be worked easily with wood and metal working tools. Water is used as a lubricant.

Some Types of Product. Two products of interest are impregnated plywood and densified wood. The first has a lower water absorbtion, is more resistant to insect attack and is less inflammable than ordinary plywood. The second made from impregnated wood veneers produces a material with a higher specific gravity and increased tensile strength. This material is said to have strength approximating to metals while still only having specific gravity one-sixth that of iron.

One kind of laminated plastic panel is marketed in a standard size of 8 ft. × 4 ft. × 1 in. consisting of a series of double " T " girders with webs at approximately 2 inch centres separated by rectangular cavities running the entire length of the panel. The cavities can, if necessary, be filled with sound proofing materials. It lends itself well to the construction of wall partitions.

Another type is marketed in panels 9 ft. × 4 ft. × $\frac{1}{16}$ in. and is a good facing material for walls or horizontal surfaces.

Cheaper products for use as partitions are made from sawdust or wood wool bonded with a synthetic resin adhesive and faced with paper, wood veneer or metal foil.

Expanded Plastics. Plastic materials produced by special techniques in the form of solidified foams consisting of a large number of bubbles held together by a little plastic are known as expanded plastics. Owing to their low specific gravity and low thermal conductivity they are used for thermal insulation.

Synthetic Adhesives. A result of intensive research has been the production of specialised adhesives for bonding almost any material. Adhesives are now available which produce a joint with aluminium which is stronger than that produced by riveting. Special adhesives are available for bonding metals, wood, glass, leather, rubber, fabrics and many other materials.

Moulded Plastics. An extremely wide variety of moulded plastics are in use in the kitchen and for plumbing and sanitation. Plastic wash basins, lavatory basins and seats which are light in weight, unbreakable and do not stain, are being more widely applied.

Extruded Plastics. Among this type of product are pipes manufactured from extruded phenolic plastics which have been used both in America and this country for plumbing purposes. They are claimed to be easier to install and repair than lead or copper and as they possess certain elastic qualities may prove more resistant to bursting when frozen in winter.

Applications in the Hospital

Walls. There are many types of plastic materials used, varying from the cheaper resin bonded sawdust board suitable for indoor partitions to resin bonded plywood, attractive laminates employing beautiful veneers or other coloured materials as a decorative surface, also cellular and expanded plastics for sound and heat insulation. As the surface of these laminates is easy to clean, capable of chemical sterilisation, hard wearing and highly scratch-resisting they would appear ideal material for hospital corridors, wards, bathrooms and lavatories.

Roofing. Laminated structures can be used for roofing if provision is made for adequate ventilation. Roof lighting can be provided by transparent acrylic sheeting which is claimed to have the advantages over wired glass, apart from being unbreakable, of being easily fitted since the sheet can be drilled and bolted and no frames are needed and also it has a higher light transmission factor.

Flooring. Laminates can be used as flooring materials for bathrooms and lavatories, with the advantage of easy cleaning.

Ventilation. Plastic ducting is available for ventilation and fume extraction.

Sanitation. Wash basins, lavatory basins and seats are now available, which wear well, are attractive in appearance as well as being non-corrodible. They can easily be cleaned with detergents (abrasive should not be used). Pipes for plumbing purposes are also obtainable as mentioned above.

Electrical. There has been very extensive use of plastics in this field for wall switches, plugs, lamp fittings, fuse boxes, control panels, etc. The majority of cables are now said to be insulated with plastic in place of rubber as it has the advantage of not perishing with time.

Kitchen. Hygiene and ease of cleaning can be facilitated by the use of laminated wall board, plastic flooring and plastic scoops, measures and crockery.

Fabrics. There are now many kinds of fabric available of all weights from heavy duty materials suitable for upholstery to the finer nylons and similar materials.

Paints and Lacquers. Special paints and lacquers are available which produce tough, corrosion-resisting surfaces suitable for walls, floors and furniture.

RECORDS

Types of Registration Systems

There are four types of registration system available for medical records and these are :—

Centralised Unit. In this system a patient is assigned a number on first admission and this same number is used for all subsequent admissions. Records are all kept in one folder in one central department.

Centralised Serial. A new number is given to the patient on each admission under this system and all records are kept in a central department.

Decentralised Unit. The patient has one number for all admissions to any department and the records are filed in the departments issuing the numbers, for example out-patient records are kept in the out-patient department.

Decentralised Serial. In this system a new number is given to the patient on each admission to any department of the hospital. The records are filed in the departments issuing the numbers.

Continuity Essential

It is generally considered that decentralised systems are undesirable and the tendancy now is towards some type of centralised system. The centralised unit system using one number, one folder and one central index was first developed in the U.S.A. and is considered as probably the most suitable for the majority of hospitals. It has already been adopted by several of the larger hospitals and others are in process of changing to this system. The advantages of this system are that it supplies a complete hospital history of the patient thereby ensuring continuity of treatment and it also facilitates research work. The keeping of all notes in one place and the use of one central index both help in the day to day work of note keeping and in the ease of checking whether a patient has been in hospital previously. This system is recommended in the report Some Observations on Hospital Admissions and Records published by King Edward's Hospital Fund for London.

Microfilm and Records

The space taken up by old medical records is often the factor which decides their retention or destruction, and as material of great value may be obtainable in old notes microfilming can perhaps provide the answer to the problem. It is claimed that no other method of documentary reproduction can rival microfilming for cheapness or for saving storage space.

The technique is applicable to all types of documents and it is claimed that even X-ray plates can be reproduced satisfactorily on 35 mm. films. In one system of microfilming records, safety film (which is less inflammable than paper) is used for the purpose in 100ft. rolls on which 1500 separate items can be photographed. This roll of 35mm. film is packed in tins measuring only 4 inches in diameter by 1¾ inches high. Any frame on this film is reproducible in a very short time and it is claimed that full sized bromide paper enlargements can be prepared in an emergency in less than 15 minutes.

One hospital using the system of microfilming uses 16 mm. films. Two films are taken simultaneously and the cost is said to work out as little as 0.048 of a penny per page of notes photographed. At this hospital the central card index continues to be used for records which have been microfilmed. The index card is stamped "microfilmed" and the number of the spool entered on it for reference. As this will ultimately lead to the central card index becoming unwieldy it has been suggested that the difficulty can then be overcome by sub-dividing it into a current and non-current index. As two films are taken the first spool is left complete as a control and the second cut up into lengths which cover a complete set of records and these are then filed numerically in envelopes using the notes' previous folder number. A special index of microfilm is kept and numbers can be selected from the diagnostic index and appropriate sections taken from the film sections and spliced together for the use of doctors who wish to study a special series of cases.

Considerations in Planning Medical Records Department

(See plan of medical records department in relation to an out-patients department given on the next page.)

When planning a Medical Records Department the main essentials to consider are :—

1. Long walls for cabinets.
2. Light.
3. Basement storage room (see stairs on plan).
4. Closed room—issue and receipt of records through hatch (marked on plan).
5. Proximity to Out-Patient Hall and Registration Bay.
6. Small offices for stenographers to minimise noise and interruption. These offices should have access to Out-patient

Hall through doors, but internal communication through archways or swing doors.

7. Large tables for sorting and assembling records.
8. Uniform filing cabinets and furniture.
9. Hollerith or Powers-Samas installations should not be housed near patients or staff on account of the noise. It is inadvisable for them to be placed in the Records Department itself.

REFRIGERATORS

There are few hospitals which need the large commercial type of refrigerator used for bulk storage and in most cases completely automatic plant is satisfactory for normal requirements.

Types, and Refrigerants

Commercial Plants. The refrigerators generally in use in large commercial plants are ammonia and carbon dioxide. As the former suffers from the disadvantage of unpleasant smell from the gas should there be a break, and further because ammonia attacks copper and other non-ferrous metals, it is seldom used in hospitals. As there are difficulties with automatic plant using carbon dioxide this is not often used either.

Automatic Refrigerators. The principal refrigerants used in automatic refrigerators are sulphur dioxide, methyl chloride and a substance known as "Freon 12." Although sulphur dioxide plants have been in wide use and were simple in operation improvements have been effected by the use of methyl chloride. In consequence the last named refrigerant is the most frequently used in hospital automatic plants whether for cold rooms up to 1,000 cu. ft. capacity or for the ward refrigerators of perhaps only 3 or 4 cu. ft.

The compressor type is worked by a mechanical compressor which circulates the refrigerant thereby abstracting heat from the contents of the refrigerator and its surroundings. These generally employ an electric motor to drive the compressor; air-cooled plants are normally satisfactory.

The absorbtion type has no moving parts and is operated by heat provided by electricity, gas or oil and also needs water cooling. This type has the advantage of silent working.

Sizes. There are no British Standards so far for the larger sizes of refrigerator suitable for hospitals but Post War Building Study No. 9 gives the external dimensions of a 15 cu. ft. storage capacity refrigerator as 3′×2′×5′ 3″ and for 250 cu. ft. storage capacity 7′ 4″×6′10″×7′6″. Sectional cold rooms suitable for meat or milk storage are available up to 500 cu. ft. capacity.

British standard B.S. 922: 1940 specifying performance and construction and overall dimensions, and B.S. 1183: 1944 are for domestic sizes, but the larger models may be suitable for ward kitchens.

Position of Refrigerators and Cold Rooms

When installing a cold room or self-contained machine it is important to see that the proposed position is suitable from the point of view of the surrounding atmospheric temperature. If this should be higher than the makers stipulate the effectiveness of the plant will be reduced.

Insulation

Probably the most effective insulating material in use is slab cork generally four inches thick. This needs protection against mechanical damage. If the cold room is built as a separate unit tongued and grooved boarding is generally employed for the exterior. If used for the storage of bodies for post mortems the normal design can be followed and some type of automatic refrigeration used to obtain the desired temperature.

Storage Space Requirements

Generally a cold room capacity at the rate of about 2 cu. ft. should be allowed per patient. This is only a rough guide. Other figures which have been suggested by various authorities for restaurant or canteen purposes are 0.50 cu. ft. minimum refrigerator storage capacity for 100–250 persons. For restaurants of 500–1,000 seats this figure drops to 0.37 cu. ft. Another method suggested is to allow 0.50 cu. ft. of storage space per main meal served. A separate special machine for fish storage is a useful piece of refrigerator equipment. If ice is required on a large scale a separate ice making plant will be needed.

Solid Carbon Dioxide

There is one further refrigerant which needs to be mentioned, solid carbon dioxide. This product resembles hard compressed snow and evaporates slowly without melting, one of the advantages being that no residue is left after evaporation. It has a temperature of – 110°F. and is consequently much colder than ice. It has a high refrigerating effect. The storage of commodities at low temperature in specially designed conservators is claimed to be comparatively simple with solid carbon dioxide. These conservators are mobile and independent of external power supply, but it is essential to ensure that they are designed to maintain an even temperature and to prevent excessive local cooling. Adequate insulation and the avoidance of contacting metal parts are essential to ensure a minimum consumption of the refrigerant. Solid carbon dioxide is obtainable in the form of blocks of nominal 25 lbs. weight either of square or circular cross section.

Notes on Some of the Treatments Mentioned Above

The Cream Suds Boil is a simple, inexpensive, yet effective method for removing stains. While not all stains yield to this process it is surprising how many fabrics can be restored to use by it. It can be performed in an uncovered tank fitted with an open steam pipe, or in a small boiler. Fill the tank about half full, stir in Cream Suds (4 oz. per gallon) and bring to the boil. Since the linen or cotton being treated must be under the surface of the solution, it is most important not to overload the tank.

All surface dirt, blood, albuminous matter, etc., present in the fabrics must be removed by a regular washing process in order to prevent setting of stains during the boil.

The amount of boiling necessary will vary from two to eight hours, according to the degree or type of stain. Lightly stained linen may clear up in the minimum time, while the very heavily stained linens may require the maximum time.

The work is removed from the boiler and included in the washing process of a load of white work. If it is stained by rust, this can be removed by soaking in a solution of oxalic acid (use 1 oz. oxalic acid for 6 lb. work) at 180°F. for 15 minutes. Then give at least two hot rinses to remove the oxalic acid.

An Unknown Stain is to be treated only after the washing process has failed to remove it.

1. Solvents. Spot with a solvent, e.g. acetone, amyl acetate, benzene, benzine, carbon disulphide, carbon tetrachloride, chloroform, ether, methylated spirits, trichlorethylene and turpentine but with acetate rayon use only benzene, benzine, carbon disulphide, carbon tetrachloride, turpentine, amyl acetate, and trichlorethylene.

2. Glauber Salts. Certain dyes in wools, silks and acetate rayon are removed by the following procedure. Immerse the article in a cold 2% solution of Glauber salts and gradually raise the temperature until stripping occurs. If there is no visible effect when the temperature reaches 180°F. this treatment must be discontinued.
3. Spirit Soap and Oleic Acid or Olein Treatment. Spirit soap is useful for removing stains from silks and woollens but on cotton and linen the oleic acid treatment should be given. In both cases the spirit soap or the oleic acid is rubbed well into the interstices of the cloth, then the article is submitted to a normal washing process. In the case of more resistant stains in cotton and linen the oleic acid may be scrubbed out, using a scrubbing brush and a hot alkaline solution (washing soda or metasilicate).

   Oleic acid and trichlorethylene mixed in equal parts is useful for greasy stains on white work. Rub the mixture well into the stained area and leave for 20 minutes; then put the article into the boil of a normal white work washing process.
4. Digestive Agents. 1% solution of pepsin or malt extract acidified with a few drops of dilute hydrochloric acid is used as a digestive agent. Dampen the stain with either of these mixtures and leave for about 40 minutes, and keep moist with the solution during this time (a cover will prevent rapid evaporation). Then rewash the article.
5. Hydrofluoric acid. It is not used as an agent for general treatment but a 3 : 1 water to commercial acid solution is very useful for spotting. Special precautions must be taken when using this reagent, as it is a very powerful acid, which attacks glass and must therefore be kept in a guttapercha or Bakelite bottle. Severe burns may result if it is allowed to come into contact with the skin.
6. Sodium hydrosulphite. This reducing bleach may cause damage to weighted silks but very little to cotton, linen and wool. Soak the area in a hot 1% solution for 5 minutes or, if the stain is small, after first wetting the area, rub in a pinch of sodium hydrosulphite. Spot with hydrofluoric acid and wash off almost immediately. Rinse thoroughly.

Oxidising Bleaches

An oxidising bleach treatment can be given with sodium hypochlorite bleach, with hydrogen peroxide or with potassium permanganate.

Sodium hypochlorite should be used only on white cotton, linen and rayon fabrics, and after the treatment the fabrics should be carefully rinsed to remove all traces of the bleach. The mildest method of using hypochlorite bleach is to soak the stained materials in a cold solution containing 1%—2% available chlorine. It may take several hours to remove stains in this way but it has the advantage of having a minimum effect on the strength of the fabric. Warming the solution to 140°F. will speed up the action, so will increasing the concentration to 5% available chlorine. The most rapid method of hypochlorite bleaching (and the most destructive to the fabric) is to dip the stained area alternately in a bleach solution containing 5% available chlorine and an acetic acid solution made up with 3 ounces of 56% acetic acid per gallon of water.

Hydrogen peroxide can be used on all white cotton, silk, wool and rayon fabrics and on most coloured materials. The stained articles should be completely immersed in a 1% solution of hydrogen peroxide (cold or warm), made slightly alkaline with ammonia. Bleaching will generally take several hours or even over night to produce best results. When the stain is removed, rinse the fabric well to remove the peroxide. While hydrogen peroxide does take considerable time to be effective, it is far milder in its action on fabrics and colours than sodium hypochlorite or potassium permanganate.

The permanganate treatment consists of a two-step process, as follows:

1. Soak the stained area for 1 to 2 minutes in a warm (120°F—130°F.) solution made up with 3 ounces of potassium permanganate dissolved in a gallon of water.
2. Rinse to remove the excess potassium permanganate solution, then work the stained area in a hot (160°—180°F.) solution containing 3 ounces of oxalic acid per gallon of water. Continue this until all of the brown colour has disappeared, then rinse well to remove the oxalic acid.

TEXTILES

Points in Purchasing

Where samples of fabrics can be supplied for test a wealth of valuable information can be revealed by general serviceability tests carried out at a test station which the buyer cannot find out for himself. The initial sum spent in testing fees would represent a mere fraction in bulk buying of the total sum to be expended and may well be the means of saving large sums dissipated on unreliable or unsuitable goods.

Quality in Woven Fabrics. The quality of woven fabrics is determined by the following factors :—

Handle. A fabric's handle is its softness, smoothness and suppleness which may be determined by gripping it tightly in the hand and releasing the pressure quickly. Resistance to creasing can thus be noted. Wool, silk and acetate rayon have good non-crush properties and soon recover from the crumpled state. Considerable experience, however, is needed adequately to judge the handle of a fabric. Textile auxiliaries can be used to modify the handle, i.e. make it more resistant to crushing, etc. Generally cotton handles soft and warm, linen firm and cold, real silk crackles and wool handles soft or firm according both to its quality and type.

Thickness. The thickness of a material is determined by a micrometer ; several measurements should be made in different places.

Density. The density of a fabric is judged by viewing it against the light. With filled fabrics it may first be necessary to wash the fabric in water containing soda.

Weight. Suitings and dress fabrics are judged by the weight of the material per square metre. A test portion of 10 square cm. is weighed. The weight of the material can then be obtained by multiplication. Weight of fabric lengths can then easily be calculated. Although weight is important other factors like filling should also be considered.

Strength. A test of the material between finger and thumb will give good results, although special scientific apparatus is available for testing strength. Fabrics made with folded yarns spun from long staple fibres are stronger than those made from short or shoddy wool fibres. Worsted fabrics are stronger than woollens.

Structure. The structure of a material is tested by pulling a representative sample of at least 100 sq. cm. to pieces. The various types of threads are then weighed.

Resistance to Rubbing. The resistance to friction of a material is one of the most important tests. By this test inferior wearing weft is revealed especially if it forms the surface of the fabric. To test a fabric it should be rubbed quickly with a moistened finger or stroked with a stiff brush. Another method is to scratch the surface with the finger nail. These tests easily reveal that materials made of fine firm wool fibres wear better than those manufactured from soft short wools. More accurate testing is carried out by a special machine by which a piece of fabric is rubbed against an abrasive under a given weight until a standard degree of wear is reached.

Bursting Strength. In this test a piece of fabric is stretched over a hole and the bursting strength is measured by the force in kilograms per sq. centimeter required to burst through it. The extensibility of a fabric can be tested at the same time by the extent to which it stretches before bursting. This is an important test because many fabrics are subject to this type of strain in use.

Water Repellency. The resistance of a fabric to wetting. Many types of fabric are now shower proofed by chemical treatment, but complete resistance can be obtained only by impregnating the fabric with rubber or oil. The usual form of test is the funnel or drop test, by which the number of drops are measured before the fabric becomes soaked and water comes through. A fabric claimed to be waterproof should remain waterproof after creasing.

Finish. It is desirable to know how a fabric is finished. Heavy fillings are recognised by a cloudy appearance against the light. Another test is to crumple a piece of the material and compare it with the original. If the fabric is rubbed against a glass plate the filling will come out as dust. Another method is to weigh, then boil the test portion, dry it, allow it to condition in air for 24 hours, then re-weigh, the loss of weight is the filling. If it is of poor appearance and limp after boiling and rubbing then the material is heavily filled. Highly lustrous fabrics owe their brightness to special finishing treatments such as calendering and pressing. When they are boiled they become matt and rough. Steeping in water will reveal the normal hairy appearance of a smooth fabric which (unless it has been sheared, wool; or singed, cotton) has probably been produced by pressing.

Air Permeability. The volume of air passing through a material under standard pressure conditions.

Colour Fastness. The fastness of colours to washing is tested by rubbing fabric by hand after dipping in boiling soap solution. The only test for fastness to light is exposure for a suitable period and subsequent comparison. Colour fastness with regard to perspiration can be tested by moistening the fabric with strong salt solution, allowing the material to dry, brushing it and then comparing with the original untouched material.

Shrinkability. The shrinkability of a material is judged by an ironing test. One yard of the material is placed between damp cotton fabrics and then gently ironed until it is dry. After conditioning the area shrinkage can be measured. If a fabric is claimed to be unshrinkable then it must retain its original size after treatment. Shrinking is also revealed by cockling of the fabric under hot ironing.

Characteristics

The characteristics of textiles are handle, lustre, fineness, felting, firmness, softness, elasticity and absorbtion. Linen, cotton and wool have these qualities in varying degrees and their major characteristics are given below :—

LINEN

The characteristics of linen fabrics are :—

(1) A fine lustre due to the reflecting smoothness of the fibre.
(2) Non-porosity of the fibres which therefore do not take on dirt so easily.
(3) The fibres are stiff and not elastic, consequently linen materials crease easily and need frequent washing.
(4) Readily absorb water and dry quickly.

(5) Bleach and dye readily, but lack fastness of colours.
(6) Owing to the longer fibres do not lint easily like cotton.
(7) Resistant to wear because the fibres are longer and lie more closely than cotton.
(8) Good conductors of heat and therefore cool to wear.

These qualities are said to render linen the best material for handkerchiefs, towels, dish cloths, sheets, table-cloths, etc.

COTTON

The characteristics of cotton are :—

(1) Cotton is cool to the touch and a non-conductor of heat.
(2) It washes easily.
(3) It is serviceable and inexpensive.
(4) Body or thickness may be given to it by starching.
(5) Cotton only shrinks when loosely woven, due to the loss of sizing.
(6) Crushes easily because it lacks natural body or stiffness.
(7) Wrinkles easily, but does not lose shape.
(8) Not so elastic as wool or silks.
(9) Does not take dye so easily as wool and silks.
(10) Takes on dirt fairly readily.
(11) Less absorbent than linen.

WOOL

Wool's chief characteristics are :—

(1) Shrinking or felting which is due to the scale with which the fibre is covered.
(2) High-grade wool fibres have a close wave which improves their spinning qualities and increases elasticity.
(3) High tensile strength and therefore resistant to hard wear.
(4) A poor conductor of heat and therefore warm.
(5) Elastic and in consequence woollen materials retain their shape. More elastic than cotton.
(6) Dyes well.
(7) Does not soil easily unlike cotton. This is due to the smoothness of the scales on the fibre.
(8) Worsted fabrics wear shiny owing to the smoothness of the surface.
(9) Woollen fabrics do not tailor so easily as worsteds as their softness does not permit shape to be retained so readily.

Care of Hospital Fabrics

The importance of preserving linen and lengthening its life is paramount in present circumstances and a great deal can be done towards this by the organisation of a proper system of linen care in the hospital. A central linen room, if properly administered, can have an important place in this scheme and will make it easier to rotate the linen and remove those pieces needing repair and replacement. (See below, Central Linen Room—Organisation.)

BLANKETS

There are two important factors in the care of blankets, first laundering. A single bad laundering will almost ruin a good blanket. Woollen fabrics shrink rapidly if subjected to sudden changes of temperature when wet. Alkalis attack the wool itself, and rubbing is conducive to felting. For washing blankets it is suggested that only a low titer soap with no builder should be used and in a sufficient amount to produce four to six inch suds. The temperature of the water should never exceed 105°F. and is better if kept at from 90° to 95°F. The machine should be run slowly to avoid undue rubbing. Drying should be carried out under tension and the blankets protected from sudden changes of temperature.

The second factor is moth attack. As a protection against moths the blankets should first be washed and when dry, sprinkled with dichlorbenzene flakes (about ¼ ounce per blanket), folded and wrapped up in brown paper in bundles of not more than five. All openings in the paper should be sealed with gummed paper. The blankets can then be stored in a cool, dry, well-ventilated room.

Paradichlorbenzene will kill both larvae and moths and prevent their future ingress. Some of these chemical compounds need to be sprayed and some require immersion. Another method of disposing of moths is to subject the blankets to a temperature of 135°F in a steriliser. This is sufficient to kill all larvae. A cold storage method is to drop the temperature to 18°F. for a few hours to kill existing larvae. Then in order to permit the emergence of larvae from any unhatched eggs raise the temperature to 50° and then kill these new larvae by once again dropping the temperature to 18°F. Storage can be continued at 40°.

SHEETS

With regard to the care of sheets there are several points which should be watched in the avoidance of excessive wear. In the laundry too much bleaching, which in any case weakens the fibres, and insufficient rinsing should be avoided. Sheets should not be too small, for patients subject small sheets to undue strain in trying to adjust them. Overwork can be avoided by not having too small a stock of linen. Care in handling is another important factor, if they are subjected to rough usage in stripping beds or in the laundry machine this will shorten their life unnecessarily. Mildew can be avoided by not leaving wet sheets in bundles in hot muggy weather.

CLOTHING

The care of clothing is generally speaking the avoidance of ill use. The major influences causing deterioration of clothing are sunlight, dampness, various kinds of organisms, and every-day wear and tear.

Sunlight. Sunlight sets up chemical changes in fabrics and reduces the strength of the fibres. It causes a gradual decomposition of the fibre substances into a simpler molecular structure. Ultimately these new chemical substances are found to be soluble in water or dilute alkalis. It is an important consideration because the weakness of a fabric is not noted until it has been washed in soap or soda liquor where some of it dissolves and the weakness becomes at once apparent. Fortunately it is a slow process, but some of the materials designed to improve the handle or give colour to fabrics hasten the deterioration.

Dampness. Dampness is bad for clothes for two reasons. First water in itself brings decomposition by swelling the fibres and its presence assists any other harmful substance to attack the fabric. The second reason is that it increases the activity of bacteria. If the material is sufficiently dry they remain inactive, but if the dampness of a fabric is increased they at once become active and produce rapid deterioration and serious loss of strength.

High Temperatures. In certain materials high temperatures may cause a decomposition of the fibre substance itself. Apart from this they tend to have an activating effect on substances which are present in the fabric. Care should be taken to avoid very high temperatures with nylons and acetate rayons as they can be melted.

Perspiration. As perspiration can be both acid and alkaline it can be most harmful to fabrics. When it is fresh it is acid, but when stale it ferments and becomes alkaline owing to the formation of ammonia. Since most fabrics are adversely affected by acids or alkalis, materials made of animal or vegetable fibres will sooner or later become impoverished. Perspiration is also an excellent nutrient material for bacteria.

Wear and Tear. Very little can be done to prevent wear and tear which occurs from abrasion and flexing of the fibres in use. As this process goes on the fibres break and ultimately a thread goes, which by increasing the local strain, permits a hole to appear. The only remedy is darning and mending in time to prevent excessive strain and a worsening of the hole in the fabric.

Moth. The larvae of clothes moth eat only woollen fabrics. There is stated to be only one certain preventative against moth and that is chemical treatment which makes the material uneatable or actually poisonous to the larvae. The most satisfactory solution is to have these materials applied during dyeing and finishing of clothing. The use of moth balls is considered of doubtful value. (For further information on moths see Blankets above.)

Felting of Wool. The felting or matting of woollen garments is considerably accelerated by the use of hot water. The process is slow in cold water, but most rapid in water about as hot as the hand can bear. It is best avoided by squeezing and rubbing as little as possible. Badly soiled woollens however cannot be washed clean under such mild treatment and some shrinking will be found to occur ultimately.

Bleaching. As bleaching, usually carried out by a chlorinating agent, oxidises the cellulose of cotton clothing at the same time as it whitens, it follows that it is a process of degradation of the material by gaining whiteness at the expense of tensile strength. Provided, however, bleaching is carefully controlled and carried out by skilled operatives the life of articles is little affected.

POINTS TO BE NOTED WITH REFERENCE TO SOME MATERIALS

Cellulose Fibres—Cotton, linen, viscose and cuprammonium rayons—are easily deteriorated by acids, but fairly resistant to alkalis. Animal or protein fibres—silk, wool, etc.—are easily attacked by alkalis and are fairly resistant to acids. Neither of these categories are affected by organic solvents like carbon tetrachloride, trichloroethylene, white spirit or petrol. Acetate Rayon is changed by exposure to alkalis (for example a warm solution of washing soda) so that it becomes regenerated cellulose. It usually becomes weakened in addition to having its textile qualities completely changed. It is harmed by acids in the same way as cotton and viscose rayon. If it is ironed at too high a temperature it will soften the fabric. Nylon and vinyon are affected similarly. Acetate rayon is swollen or affected by organic solvents particularly when they are hot. If they should be used for any special purpose a test should be made on a waste portion of the material to see if there is any adverse effect. Acetate rayon and nylon are resistant to bacteria.

Viscose, cuprammonium and acetate rayons lose tensile strength when wet and tear quite easily so care should be taken when washing. Neither nylon nor vinyon lose tensile strength when wet.

Central Linen Room—Organisation

In this system, for each article of soiled linen discarded by a ward in the morning a corresponding clean article is issued to replace it by the central linen room the same day. This results in wards and departments not needing to hold stocks to last more than 72 hours with a consequent saving in ward storage space.

In order to operate this method each article of linen needs to be coded. This eliminates errors due to incorrect description. Similar articles, however, can still be used for different purposes by using different code numbers; for example :—

Sheets, patients	156
Sheets, staff	157

Two rooms will also be needed one as a clean linen room and the other as a soiled linen room.

Operation of System

Each ward has a laundry check list book containing forms listing all articles in use with their code numbers, also columns in which to enter totals for "clean" and "dirty" against each article and totals of all articles. Spaces are given for "Checked Dirty," "Received Dirty," "Checked Clean" and "Received Clean." Alternate forms are perforated.

The previous day's dirty articles are sorted out by the ward and totals entered in the dirty column against each code number. After checking the total number of articles against the total shown on the form the "checked dirty" space is initialled.

Upon receipt of the soiled linen container including the perforated copy of the form in the soiled linen room, the contents are checked against the laundry check list and initialled in the "checked dirty" space. The form then passes to the clean linen room.

For each article shown in the dirty column a clean one is issued by the clean linen room and the form initialled in the "checked clean" space. The form is then passed to the central linen room clerk, who enters the figures in the clean column of the analysis sheet. Down the longer side, on the left of this form, is a list of articles with code numbers. At the top are the names of the wards. The whole form is then cross-ruled into squares for entries to be made in each ward-column of the quantity against each article. On the right is a column for code number totals and at the bottom spaces for ward totals.

The central linen room clerk initials the clean column total of the laundry check list which is passed back to the clean linen room. The container of clean linen is then delivered to the ward where it is checked and the "received clean" space on the laundry check list initialled and the form passed back to the central linen room for filing. This procedure takes place in the morning.

Operation of Soiled Linen Room

Every morning the articles in each container are checked by the soiled linen checker who having initialled the laundry check list frees the articles for binning according to their code numbers. Finally, before packing and dispatch to the laundry, when all consignments have been checked the numbers of articles in each bin are recorded on a summary sheet which is then totalled. An agreement of this total must then be obtained from the central linen room clerk who will have completed the analysis sheet. If there is a difference, the figures for each code number can be called over between the summary sheet and analysis sheet, thereby isolating the difference to one or more code numbers which can then be rechecked and the difference settled.

On agreement, the external laundry list (in duplicate) is filled in and one copy is collected with the dirty linen by the laundry. This form comprises columns of code numbers against each of which is a space for "Number sent" and "Number returned." At the bottom are four spaces for totals "sent by hospital," "received by laundry," "returned by laundry," "returned at hospital."

Operation of Clean Linen Room

The criterion of smooth running of the clean linen room is a steady flow of laundry check lists from the soiled linen room. As each list is received a clean consignment is made up on a one-for-one basis of the articles shown against each code number. As each code number is dealt with the numbers of articles are entered in the clean column of the laundry check list. On completion the "checked clean" space is initialled. The total figure is then initialled by the central linen room clerk who returns the form to the clean linen room. The filled clean container is then delivered to the ward.

In the afternoon the bulk consignment of clean laundry is received from the laundry together with the copy of the external laundry list. The articles are at once checked and binned according to code numbers. A record is kept on a summary sheet. The figures against each code number are then totalled.

Immediately the consignment of laundry is counted the figures entered by the laundry on the external laundry list must be checked with those shown against each code number on the summary sheet. Should there be a difference a recheck of the relevant coded articles must be carried out. If the difference persists between the " sent " figure and " returned " the excess or deficiency must be entered on a statement of deficiencies form. This shows spaces for the code number, number of articles sent, number of articles returned (both laundry and hospital count) and number of articles deficient (or in excess).

Stock Records for Clean Linen

It is suggested that a better control is obtained by having the bin records kept by the central linen room clerk. A separate bin card is allocated to each code number on which the following entries are made :—

(1) Issues—posted from the horizontal total for the appropriate code number on the analysis sheet.
(2) Receipts—posted from the " returned " column (amended figure, if necessary, from hospital recount) of the external laundry list.
(3) Balance—calculated from the balance of the previous day and the net increase or decrease between the days issues and receipts.

The bin cards are filed numerically according to code number in a container in the central linen room clerk's office.

There should be two spaces marked " maximum " and " minimum " stocks on the bin cards. These figures will depend on : (a) the space available in the clean linen room bins ; and (b) the normal daily issues to wards and departments. It is not advisable, however, for these entries to be made until the central linen room has been working for at least a month.

The central linen room clerk when posting the bin cards and calculating the figure to by put in the balance column should constantly refer to the " maximum " and " minimum " figures. If the balance exceeds the "maximum" stock, the responsible officer for the central linen room, on being notified, will arrange the transfer of surplus stock to the reserve stock. If the balance figure is less than the "minimum" stock a requisition must be made immediately for the transfer of items to make up from the reserve stock.

VENTILATION

(See also under Heating)

The minimum standard of ventilation required for health cannot accurately be determined but in Post War Building Study No. 19, it is assumed that under normal conditions 600 cu. ft. per person per hour is the minimum requirement. The rate of ventilation is generally expressed by the number of complete changes of the total volume of air in a room per hour. The general practice in hospitals is to allow for three changes of air per hour except in special areas such as the operating theatre. Excessive ventilation gives rise to unnecessary draughts under doors, windows, etc.

The ventilation of buildings is closely bound up with the subject of heating. Under that head will be found a table of air changes per hour for each section of the hospital based on figures given by the Institution of Heating and Ventilating Engineers in its publication. The Computation of Heat Requirements for Buildings

Natural System

In normal living rooms the windows and fire place aperture supply adequate ventilation. In large buildings, however, the building itself is designed to encourage the circulation of air by natural means without causing draughts. Cross-ventilation permits the use of smaller intakes in windows and employs the difference in atmospheric pressure on two sides of a building (which is always present even in conditions of little air movement) to cause the flow of air through the rooms. Air is withdrawn from the windows on the side of the building with the lower atmospheric pressure and there are no draughts straight through the rooms from the windward side. Another system of supplying natural ventilation when windows and doors are closed is by dividing walls into two with an air cavity between. A supply of air is then drawn in at the base of the building and discharged into the roof. Under each window an inlet can be provided to allow the fresh air to enter the wards after passing over the radiators. Outlets above each window allow the heated and impure air to pass up into a separate shaft and out of the eaves on either side of the hospital depending on the direction of the wind.

Plenum System

This is a mechanical system by which the volumes of air delivered and extracted are balanced by means of fans. Windows and doors are kept closed and a slight pressure is maintained in the rooms served. Humidity and temperature control are usually included in this type of ventilation. There are two variants of this system, one with a mechanical inlet where the air is drawn in by means of a fan and the impure air is allowed to escape through natural outlets, and the other where incoming air enters through natural inlets and is then extracted mechanically. In the former the air is often cleaned and heated, in the latter method treatment of the air is unusual.

Operating Theatres

It has been suggested by various authorities that the extract ventilation from the operating theatre should if possible take place from the sterilising room so as to ensure that the air stream is through the theatre and then through the sterilising room and then out. If the reverse procedure is adopted there is a possibility of steam being drawn into the theatre causing condensation on the walls. (For further notes on heating and ventilating special departments see under Heating).

Prevention of Cross Infection

Recent research into the quantity of infectious organisms present in the air in wards and operating theatres of hospitals has led to the formulation of the following general measures for the prevention of cross infection.

Bed Spacing

Overcrowding of patients should always be avoided. The Ministry of Health recommends for multiple bed wards for infectious diseases that the distance between bed centres should not be less than 12 ft. In children's general wards and maternity units it is recommended in The Control of Cross Infection in Hospitals that this distance, wherever possible, should be adhered to and that in no circumstances should the distance between bed centres drop to less than 8 ft.

Face Masks

Face masks should be of an efficient type consisting of at least six layers of 40-mesh gauze or two layers of gauze with an impermeable cellophane or paper insert.

Blankets

The careful handling of blankets to minimise the scattering of dust particles should be stressed and oil treatment should be considered.

Oiling of Floors

The memorandum on The Control of Cross Infection in Hospitals recommends the treatment of wood and linoleum floors in wards and passages with spindle oil, as then the dust does not rise when sweeping is in process. Rubber composition and concrete floors should not be oiled but either washed, vacuum cleaned, or sprinkled with damp sawdust before sweeping. Dusters should be damp and no dry dusting should be done.

Spindle oil is an inexpensive crude petroleum used in the cotton industry as a lubricant and is readily obtainable. About one gallon per 800-1,000 sq.ft. is the quantity required per application. It should only be applied to wood or linoleum floors. Rubber is damaged by it and it should, therefore, not be used on this type of flooring. The slipperiness of an oiled floor wears off after a few hours.

The method of application recommended is first to scrub the floor to remove old polish, leave it to dry for 24 hours and then apply the oil quickly and sparingly with large mops at times of least traffic. Oiled floors should be swept with dry brushes of medium hardness and it will be found that the dust becomes matted together in rolls without rising.

Ventilation

The importance of adequate ventilation is stressed for it has been found that when windows are wide open the microbic content of air in wards is little higher than the outside air, whereas when windows are closed even with no bed-making in progress the count obtained is far higher than in outside air. Windows should always be opened after bedmaking and dressing.

Good lighting is a further important factor as daylight even through glass is bactericidal.

Operating Theatres

The chief source of infection in many operating theatres has been found to be the dirty air sucked under the doors leading to adjacent rooms and corridors. This is due to the prevalent use of exhaust fans without any corresponding input fans.

This trouble can be overcome by the installation of a plenum system which maintains a slight positive pressure in the theatre so that air escapes under the doors. This will prevent dust, and organisms which may fall to the floor from ward blankets, from being sucked into the theatre. The other major source is textile fabrics containing wool which are said in contrast to cotton fabrics to be liable to return from the laundry bearing a large number of bacteria. Badly fitting masks are another source of airborne infection.

Preventative Measures

The following methods have been tried by various hospitals as a means of reducing the bacterial contamination of air in operating theatres.

The first is the provision of an air intake preferably from an inlet 10 to 15 feet above roof level. This air can then be filtered as circumstances require. Even after filtration through the cheaper types of filter using cotton wool, oiled metal or cloth it will be very much cleaner than the air ordinarily present in hospitals. Ten changes of air per hour are recommended for small theatres and six for larger ones as an economical minimum.

Although the exclusion of all non-sterile clothing is an ideal which does not appear to be practical at present, ward blankets and bed linen should always be excluded from the theatre, and also from the hall and anaesthetic room, unless plenum ventilation is used. Another measure suggested is the daily provision of fresh sterile linen or cotton covers for such woollen coverings as are used in the theatre. Two further suggestions are the provision of oiled night gowns or pyjamas for patients before operations, and rather more care to be paid to the clothing of stretcher bearers and other theatre personnel than is customary.

VERMIN EXTERMINATION

Insects

Although general principles of treatment can be adduced for treatment of insects as a whole there are of course variations from species to species. The cockroach for example is fairly resistant to D.D.T., the housefly on the other hand is not.

Insecticides

A popular form of insecticide is that which is produced as a solution of insecticidal ingredients in oil. These can be applied by means of a fine insecticidal mist from a hand sprayer. Compounds used in this way are pyrethrum, nicotine, D.D.T., gammexine and rotenone.

Pyrethrum and rotenone are both plant extracts of Asiatic origin. These insecticides produce a knock-down effect and are usually applied by spray or atomiser. Kerosene or paraffin odour is sometimes associated with sprayed insecticides, but the odour has been in many cases eliminated. Modern commercial products are usually non-staining and non-poisonous to warm blooded animals—and invariably harmless to human beings.

Powders as well as sprays are also marketed. Some of these are simply pyrethrum compounds, some containing D.D.T. and some containing both.

D.D.T. Preparations

Dichloro-Diphenyl-Triclorethane (D.D.T.) was mainly developed in recent years largely due to the needs of the war and the sources of supply of the older insecticides like pyrethrum being under Japanese control, and the urgent military need for some other product to take their place. D.D.T. has a paralysing effect on the nervous system of insects and acts as a stomach poison, and does not have a knock-down effect. It is extremely stable and not subject to the oxidising effect of air and light which affect pyrethrum compounds. It requires processing and combination with other agents and like the older insecticides has a number of modes of application. Pyrethrum and D.D.T. together have proved an effective compound. Their use in an activated paint film has yielded good results against cockroaches and beetles, if they are applied to surfaces which attract the insects such as near lights, warmth and where food smells are strong. Combinations of D.D.T. and pyrethrum are also marketed as a spray the residual deposits of which remain toxic to flies, fleas and bugs for several weeks after spraying. Powders containing D.D.T. can also be obtained and these are scattered by means of a blower. Another kind is in the form of a vapour which being ignited spreads in a dense cloud penetrating cracks and crevices which cannot be reached by dust or spray.

Smooth surfaces, old paint and concrete hold D.D.T. for a considerable time. The Ministry of Agriculture however, suggest that residual sprays are quite effective on the usual warehouse lime wash.

Ants

A very small red ant is the kind most often found in the basements and foundations of hospitals. It infests larders and kitchens, feeding on a wide variety of human food. The best recommended methods of extermination is by the use of poison bait as follows:—6 parts by bulk sodium flouride, 2 parts by bulk fresh pyrethrum powder, two parts by bulk corn starch. This should be sprinkled in the runways of the ants, care being taken that foodstuffs are not contaminated and that it is out of the reach of domestic animals and children. Grease banding will help to prevent ants gaining access from outside.

Bed Bugs

Common hiding places of the bed bug are in mattresses and the crevices of beds, in the cracks of furniture, on the underside of seats and chairs, in floor boards and in cracks in wall plaster. D.D.T. has given good results. Both five per cent. D.D.T. powder and five per cent. D.D.T. sprays have been used with complete success against long standing infestations. The older method on heavily infested premises which was certain to kill both bugs and their eggs was by the use of hydrocyanic acid gas. The Hydrogen Cyanide (Fumigation) Act, 1937, lays down the precautions to be taken.

Cockroaches

Two species are common in this country, both kinds like the dark and live in cracks and crevices in kitchens and laundries, etc. They eat a variety of substances, for example, paper and leather apart from human food.

Poison baits are the usual means of extermination but it is never completely effective. D.D.T. embodied in oil-bound distempers has yielded good results as mentioned above. After treatment cracks and crevices should be made good particularly in skirtings. Paper pulp and size with putty or cement mortar are effective.

Crickets

These creatures normally live near hot pipes, hearths and similar warm places. Crickets live on crumbs and similar refuse; decaying organic matter provides them with a breeding ground. Poison bait can be employed to destroy these insects. An effective poison is 6 parts by bulk sodium flouride, 2 parts by bulk fresh pyrethrum powder, 2 parts by bulk of corn starch. D.D.T. is highly toxic to crickets. After treatment it is advisable to fill up cracks and crevices with pulp of paper and size.

Fleas

There are several kinds of fleas found in this country. The human flea, the dog flea, the cat flea, and occasionally the plague flea. It is important to keep domestic animals free from fleas. If a room is seriously infested, flaked naphthalene or para-dichlor-benzene crystals should be sprinkled on the floor and the room shut up. Fumigation with sulphur and spraying with one of the light paraffin-basis sprays is also an effective method of extermination.

Rats

The presence of rats can usually be ascertained by a knowledge of the signs of nesting places, feeding places and runs between the two. Nesting material, food and water and undisturbed nesting sites are always necessary conditions for the formation of a rat colony. There are eight kinds of traces indicating a rat infestation :—(1) Smears formed by the formation of a path and the rubbing of the rats bodies on projections and mud smears from their feet. (2) The presence of holes and scrapes. (3) Runways, i.e. beaten down tracks in earth or mounds of refuse. (4) Gnawing marks on food, soap or lead piping. (5) Droppings. (6) Foot marks. (7) Tail marks. (8) Damage to food stocks.

Three arbitrary though convenient classifications of infestation can be estimated from the above signs. Minor, confined to infestations of less than twenty rats. Major, from twenty to two hundred rats. Most important infestations fall in this category. Reservoir, more than two hundred rats. Large infestations which are liable to colonise and infest other areas in the neighbourhood.

Control Methods—Poison

Density of rat population is most important. This should be found out before attempting control as diffuse populations are more difficult to deal with. It is useless to deal only with rats in a building if they have connections with those living in the sewers. A general survey of an infestation should give a rough knowledge of the rat population and the relation between that in question and other infestations. This will give where most of the rats are living and feeding and in consequence where baits can most advantageously be laid.

Poisoning is generally the best method of dealing with rats. It has generally been found, however, that preliminary baiting without poison is essential, as rats are suspicious creatures and tend only to nibble the bait at first. This is enough to cause illness but not to kill them. The best method is therefore to lay a plain bait for several nights to ensure that the rats are conditioned by use into eating the bait and when the poison is added they will eat it readily and die.

Hole baiting is the most efficient method. When an infestation can entirely be treated in this way two days prebaiting only is needed and post-baiting is not needed at all. In buildings, surface baiting is most commonly used. Bait must be laid on runs or as near nesting sites as possible. Containers are principally a safety measure for the security of domestic animals. The same base must be used each time both for prebaiting and poison. Suggested bases are damp sausage, a medium grade used with its own weight of water, sugar meal, bread mash and soaked wheat. Poisons are zinc phosphide, arsenious oxide, red squill powder and one antu (alphanaphthyl-thio-urea) which is highly effective but not widely available.

An effective method for dealing with infestations in the open and where the holes are easily identifiable is dusting with powders that liberate a poisonous gas. The powder may be introduced by a spoon tied to a stick or by a pump. Cyanide powders should not be used when there is a high wind or in buildings where human beings are liable to breathe it. Neither should they be used in wet weather or on wet ground as the poison gas is soluble in water.

Trapping

The best type of trap to use is a breakback with a treadle. This method is only successful if there are a small number of rats, i.e. to kill off the remainder after poison, and a large number of traps are used. Traps should be put down baited but unset for four or five nights to overcome the rats' suspicions.

Procedure after killing rats

After treatment a building should be given a thorough survey and all holes in outside walls filled with fine concrete. Broken fittings should be renewed and wood panelling and door frames should be fitted with sheet metal at vulnerable places as a protection against gnawing. Defective drains should be repaired.

It is important to remember that an infested area should not, in general, be disturbed until after treatment, but then all food should be made inaccessible, accumulations of rubbish removed and cover denied to the rats.

WASHING, ESSENTIALS OF GOOD

WATER SOFTENING

The degree of hardness of water varies a great deal throughout the British Isles and in some districts a very high degree both of permanent and temporary hardness is to be found. On the other hand, in some cases, it actually has to be artificially hardened to prevent trouble with distributive pipework. From the hospital engineer's point of view water softening is often necessary to prevent scale deposit in boilers, it is also needed to keep hot-water cylinders and distributive pipework free from scale not only from the point of view of fuel economy but of obstruction in supply.

Water softening is necessary only for water which is to be heated. This is excluding hot water heating systems, for the treatment of which see notes below. Cold water does not need treatment.

Types of Plant

Two types of water softening plant are in common use, first the lime soda process and second the base exchange or zeolite process. The first employs lime and soda to reduce hardness and the second either a natural or artificial zeolitic material (greensand can be employed in its natural form) and the process is carried out by the introduction of brine prepared from special salt in a tank forming part of the plant. Although the lime soda process is more economical in use it suffers from the disadvantage of the production of sludge for which disposal must be arranged. Base exchange, on the other hand, does not produce any by-product.

Degree of Softening and Economies

It is generally undesirable to soften water below 4 °or 5° for ordinary domestic hot water systems, because although copper pipework is unaffected, mild steel pipes tend to become corroded and the saving of soap below 4° does not counterbalance the added cost of softening materials. Various estimates of the economics of water saving have been made both in this country and America. In the latter researches it was estimated that the softening of the hot water services of a hospital with hard water supply results in sufficient saving in soap to pay for the cost of installation and operation in less than two years. It was estimated that the neutralising action of hard water consumes about 0.07 lbs. of soap per 100 gallons per degree of hardness.

With regard to hospital laundries, research was carried out in 1939 in England and it was estimated that in laundry work 100 gallons of water of 15 degrees of hardness required 20-24 ozs. more good flake soap than water of zero hardness. (Cost of this quantity of soap at that time was about 4d. and the cost of softening the water about 1½d.) Four degrees of hardness in laundries makes softening of economic value, particularly when it is borne in mind that among other effects hard water combines with soap to produce insoluble lime soap, which adheres to fabrics and destroys their brightness.

Boiler Feed Water

Simple softening treatment for boiler feed water is not necessarily satisfactory. If water is taken from a base exchange plant and softened to zero hardness for make-up purposes it is often necessary to add to the resulting mixture of condensate return and of soft water a proportion of raw unsoftened feed water in order to prevent corrosion and pitting which are liable to occur if completely soft water is used. In some waters carbon dioxide in solution will, if a base exchange plant is used, produce a water which needs corrective chemical treatment. Lime soda plants are less likely to produce water which needs chemical treatment for boiler feed purposes.

Small Boiler Plants

Suitable treatment can be arranged for boiler feed water for small plants without using either lime soda or base exchange plants. Analyses must be made of the initial water supply and a determination made of the proportion of condensate returning to the plant, so that a combined analysis can be made for specific chemical treatment. Once the correct formula has been determined the engineer in charge can regulate the feed by taking periodic simple analyses so that he can vary the treatment depending on the rate of evaporation and the load. If the requisite quantity of the previously determined chemical compound is dissolved in a small tank, it will be found that the resulting solution can be introduced into the feed tank or hot-well by means of a simple drip feed regulated to the correct dosage. There is no danger or unpleasantness in the steam used for cooking as the treatment of the water can be made entirely non-toxic.

Regarding alkalinity of boiler water it is important that this should be kept at a low figure. Periodic tests to check alkalinity should be made. The blowing down of boilers to keep alkalinity at a reasonable point should be regular and controlled within reasonable limits in the absence of a continuous blow down system. It is often found that steam boilers are not blown as frequently as desirable to reduce alkalinity in the interests of fuel economy, but a reasonable balance should be preserved.

II – LEGAL NOTES

These notes, which have been prepared by a barrister, are intended to afford guidance on those everyday problems upon which it is not customary or, indeed necessary, to consult a lawyer and also to indicate certain other problems upon which professional advice is desirable. It cannot be too strongly emphasised that reference to notes such as these is no satisfactory alternative to taking legal advice in respect of any matter which appears likely to lead to legal proceedings or of any transaction—such as a contract to purchase land—upon which no prudent person would enter without advice.

Accounts and Finance

As regards National Health Service hospitals see particularly the National Health Service (Hospital Accounts and Financial Provisions) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1414).

Agreements

Stamp Duty—Deeds. The stamp duty on agreements made in the form of a deed varies with the subject matter. Since, however, deeds are usually executed only on the advice of solicitors the question of the appropriate stamp duty is not ordinarily the concern of the hospital administrator. The undertaking by deed most likely to be accepted by a hospital without the intervention of a solicitor is a "Seven Year Covenant." On this the stamp duty is 2s. 6d. per £100 of the total net amount receivable by the hospital.

For the stamp duty on other deeds such as conveyances, deeds of gift and the like, the reader is referred to standard text-books such as "Alpe's Stamp Acts."

Any deed for which no special duty is fixed attracts a fixed stamp duty of 10s. 0d.

Stamp Duty—Agreements under Hand. Unless a special stamp duty or scale of stamp duty is laid down for the particular subject matter, an agreement under hand (i.e. in writing, printing, etc., authenticated by signature or initials and not under seal), attracts a fixed duty of 6d. which may be denoted by ordinary postage and revenue stamps affixed and cancelled with date or signature when the agreement is made or, within fourteen days thereafter, by an impressed stamp. Certain extensions are given in respect of agreements executed abroad. Exempt from stamp duty are agreements for the sale of goods, wares or merchandise; for the hire of any labourer, manufacturer (i.e. person who makes things with his hands) or menial servant; or where the subject matter of agreement is of less value than £5.

For the main purposes of the National Health Service Act, 1946, the National Insurance Act, 1946, the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, and the National Assistance Act, 1948, the expression the appointed day means 5th July, 1948.

Births in Hospital

Registration. Although in strict law the duty of registering a birth, in default of the father and mother, falls on any person present at the birth or having charge of the child, so that a doctor, midwife or nurse assisting at the delivery would be compellable to attend before the registrar to give the requisite information for registration, in practice such compulsion, if necessary, is in all ordinary circumstances exercised on the parents or other person in charge of the child.

Notification of Birth to the local health authority under s. 203 of the Public Health Act, 1936, must be distinguished from Registration (supra). The notification must be given to the Medical Officer of Health by prepaid letter or postcard within 36 hours of the birth, the duty being on the father if he resides on the premises where the birth takes place, and also on any person in attendance on the mother at the time of or within six hours of the birth. Hence, in the case of birth in hospital the duty falls on any doctor, midwife or nurse so attending at delivery or on the mother within six hours thereafter. Hospitals should have a routine procedure in the matter.

Contracts

It is not practicable here to offer an exact treatise on the law relating to contracts. The following must be regarded, therefore, as no more than a rough guide on one or two major points of difficulty. In the event of a contract being of an unusual nature or special importance, legal advice should be sought. Some of the most common points of difficulty are dealt with in the following paragraphs.

Form or Consideration—Options. A promise, unless given in the form of a deed, is not ordinarily enforceable unless there is some consideration given for the promise. Consideration includes not only payment of money or handing over of goods but a promise to do so or even a forbearance from doing something the promiser might otherwise have done (e.g. blocking the light from a neighbour's window which had not attained the status of an " ancient light "). With most contracts there is no difficulty in showing the consideration, but difficulties do sometimes arise as regards options. The beneficiary of an option cannot compel the giver of it to keep his offer open for a particular time—even though he may have promised to do so—unless some consideration has been given for it. Hence some nominal payment for an option is always to be recommended.

Contracts which should be in writing. Various contracts such as guarantees and contracts concerning land or any interest therein, as well as any agreement not to be performed within one year, must ordinarily be in writing to be enforceable. Equitable rights arising out of part performance of a contract not in writing but which should have been are beyond our present scope. As regards contracts not to be performed within one year, it is to be observed that this would not catch, say, a contract of service which might extend beyond a year but might terminate earlier; on the other hand a contract expressed to be for a year or more fixed, even though there might be provision for earlier termination by notice or otherwise. should be in writing.

Contracts for the sale of goods of the value of £10 or upwards to be enforceable by action must be evidenced by a note or memorandum in writing and signed by or on behalf of the party against whom action is to be brought, unless (a) the buyer accepts and actually receives part of the goods so sold or (b) the buyer gives something in earnest to bind the contract or in part payment.

Capacity to Contract—Infants. Persons under 21 years of age are liable to pay a reasonable price for necessities supplied; what are necessities being a question of fact in every case, but the most obvious examples are food, clothes, medical attention, books for studies, etc.—always provided the infant is not already sufficiently supplied and the goods or services are appropriate to his condition in life. An infant who receives and pays for other goods cannot afterwards claim back the price. Reasonable contracts of service or apprenticeship beneficial to the infant are binding on him. On the other hand an infant is not liable for money borrowed by him or on any security for a loan.

Deaths in Hospital

Registration. The doctor attending a patient in his last illness is under the statutory obligation of notifying the Registrar of Births and Deaths of what he believes to be the cause of the death or—alternatively—that he does not know the cause of death. He must also deliver to one of the persons obliged to give information of death a notice in statutory form of having sent in the certificate. The persons concerned are listed on the form of notice at present in use. Failing certain near relatives, the duty of giving information to the Registrar falls on members of the staff of the hospital, as acting either personally or in a representative capacity and as being in one or more of the following classes, viz. persons present at the death, the occupier of the house in which it occurred or the person causing the body to be buried. Since the Registrar's certificate or a coroner's order is requisite for lawful disposal of the remains, that, apart from the statutory time limit, exercises effective compulsion in most cases.

Disposal of Body. The classes of persons responsible in law for the disposal of a dead body is nowhere clearly laid down. It certainly includes, however, the surviving husband and also the parent of a child dying under 16 and, perhaps, under 21 years of age, though to-day that is more arguable. The executor or executors of the deceased or the administrators of his estate are also responsible, at all events so far as they have assets, funeral expenses being a first charge on such assets. But if none of these is willing to act, then the responsibility falls on the occupier of the premises where the death occurred (i.e. the hospital authority in the case of a person dying in hospital), but that person will have a claim for his reasonable disbursements on the estate of the deceased.

Moreover, under Section 50 of the National Assistance Act, 1948, it is possible that the local authorities named therein may be under an obligation to undertake disposal of the body where it appears that no suitable arrangements have been or are being made otherwise than by the authority. The advantage of the disposal being undertaken by the local authority rather than by the hospital authority lies in the right of recovery of expenses incurred not only from the estate of the deceased but, if need be, from any person legally liable to maintain the deceased immediately prior to his death.

Cremation. For cremation, special formalities are requisite, including a statutory declaration and two medical certificates, leading to written authority of the appropriate medical referee. It is unlawful to cremate a body if it was known to be contrary to the wishes of the deceased. The necessary forms can normally be obtained from the undertakers.

Defamation—see Libel and Slander.

Detention of Patient against his Will

A patient may be detained in hospital against his will only if there is authority in law for such detention: unauthorised detention, however meritorious in its object, will lay those concerned open to an action for false imprisonment and, if involving direct use of force on the person of the plaintiff, also to an action for assault and battery. The cases in which detention is justified may be outlined as follows: mental patients detained under the provisions of the Lunacy and Mental Treatment Acts, 1890-1930; mental defectives under the Mental Deficiency Acts, 1913-1938; certain persons detained in hospital for investigation under the Criminal Justice Act 1948; Broadmoor patients under the Criminal Lunatics Act, 1884, and the Criminal Justice Act, 1948; a person suffering from a notifiable infectious disease, but only if removed to hospital or detained there on a justice's order under the Public Health Act, 1936, or the Public Health (London) Act, 1936; a person suffering from tuberculosis of the respiratory tract in an infective state similarly removed or detained on a justice's order under the Public Health Act, 1936; in certain cases persons suffering from chronic disease or otherwise incapacitated under the National Assistance Act, 1948. Unless a patient falls into one of the above categories, there is ordinarily no authority to detain him against his will even though dangerously ill or suffering from an infectious disease. If, however, a delirious patient in his delirium expressed a desire to leave, it is suggested that it could properly be ignored.

Disabled Persons

The provisions of the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act, 1944, apply to hospital authorities as to other employers which, unless specially exempted, must employ the prescribed quota of registered disabled persons and also use registered disabled persons for prescribed types of work. Full particulars of the requirements may be obtained from any office of the Ministry of Labour and National Service, and hospitals within the National Health Service may also refer to circular R.H.B.(48).5., R.H.B.(S)(48) 8, and B.G.(48)5, as may be appropriate.

Dismissal without Notice —see under Master and Servant.

Factories Acts

By virtue of s.151(9) of the Factories Act, 1937, the provisions of the Factories Acts are extended to premises in occupation of the Crown or other public or municipal authorities where various processes are carried on which, if carried on for gain, would bring the premises within the Acts. The processes which make premises a "factory" are broadly set out in s.151. Laundries are within the Act even though not carried on for gain nor by a public authority.

The safety and welfare rules are both complex and important, and there may on occasion be doubts as to what rules are applicable. It is suggested that hospitals would be well advised to consult the local factories inspector to clear up any doubts and to obtain his suggestions.

Guarantees

A guarantee, i.e. a promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another, must be in writing. It is most desirable but not essential that the consideration for the promise—and here must be consideration unless the promise by deed—should also be reduced to writing.

House or Flat occupied by Member of Staff

Effect of Rent Restriction Acts. The division between occupation by way of tenancy to which the Acts apply and occupation as a necessary incident and condition of employment may be a fine one and the decision depends on the facts of the particular case. It is, however, an important distinction, since in the former case the rent can be increased only within the limits laid down in the Acts even though an unduly low rent was charged in the first place, whereas in the latter case the valuation of the accommodation for emolument purposes can be seemingly increased without regard to any such limits.

Notice to Quit. The distinction drawn above may also be relevant to the position which arises on the resignation or dismissal of the member of the staff concerned. Ordinarily, if an officer does not give up possession on termination of his employment the only safe procedure for his eviction is an application to the County Court. Moreover, if there is any reason during the running of the notice to believe that the officer intends to remain in possession, it would be well to consult a solicitor without delay. In any event legal advice should be sought promptly on the officer holding over and no payment of rent covering any period after the termination of the employment should be accepted without legal advice so as to avoid the risk either of creating a protected tenancy, or of implicitly admitting the existence of such tenancy or, perhaps, of prejudicing any remedy against the officer which may already exist.

In the case of, say, a nurse occupying a furnished room in the nurses' home or a domestic servant occupying similar accommodation in the home for domestic staff, there would not appear to be any kind of a tenancy and the officer could ordinarily be ejected on the termination of her engagement; but see also under Master and Servant.

Illegal Operations

Any operation for procuring an abortion or resulting in intentional physical injury to the person undergoing it, being an abortion procured or an operation performed without medical need, is a criminal offence, upon conviction for which a sentence of imprisonment may be imposed and to a charge of which offence the consent of the patient is no defence. There is much argument and some confusion on the subject of artificial insemination. It is not clear that artificial insemination by a donor (i.e. by a person other than the woman's husband, usually referred to as A.I.D.) is illegal, but it is at least questionable whether pending some clarification of the law hospital staff should in the course of their duties at the hospital be parties to such procedures.

Injuries to Patients

A full exposition of the subject of the extent and circumstances of liability of a hospital authority and of its officers for injuries to patients is beyond the scope of these notes. Broadly, however, it may be said that before the appointed day under the National Health Service Act, 1946, civilian hospital authorities were liable for injuries to patients due to the negligence or incompetence of members of the staff in the course of their duties, whether professionally qualified persons like nurses and physiotherapists or other employees such as porters and domestics, and this whether the patient was or was not being treated free. There was a good deal of obscurity as to the extent of the liability of the hospital authority for the acts and omissions of doctors and some grounds for suggesting liability for negligence or incompetence of junior grades such as housemen but not of senior specialists. In the case, however, of a private patient making a separate bargain with a specialist attending him there could be no question of the hospital authority being liable for his acts and omissions. The negligent person was also himself liable to the patient or, sometimes, in the event of the patient's death, to the nearest relatives or the deceased's estate. In addition, the hospital authority was under a contractual liability to paying and often to contributory patients and a quasi-contractual liability to patients received into a local authority hospital, for certain injuries caused without negligence, e.g. supply of contaminated food leading to illness.

The position of voluntary hospitals remaining as such is still as outlined above. In the case of National Health Service hospitals there are grounds for suggesting that they might not be liable for injuries caused by the negligence of specialist medical staff except to paying patients who pay an inclusive charge under s. 5 (1) of the National Health Service Act, 1946, but with this possible exception the authorities of these hospitals too are apparently still liable for injuries to patients to the extent outlined above. Moreover, it must be understood that the exception here suggested is by no means certain. It must also be observed that in any event the negligent or incompetent person may be held liable for injuries, loss or damage caused by his negligent acts and omissions or by the acts and omissions of those acting on his negligent or incompetent instructions.

It is rather outside the scope of these notes to deal with precautions against accidents, but it is suggested that besides taking all reasonable precautions against accidents hospitals should have an adequate reports system so that the nature and circumstances of all mishaps which might lead to a subsequent claim are duly and fully noted at the time or as soon as practicable thereafter, so that there will be no difficulty in ascertaining the facts in the event of any dispute or legal action.

Voluntary hospitals are well advised to insure against such liabilities and the obligation under most policies to advise the insurers promptly of any incident which is likely to lead to a claim must not be overlooked.

Injuries to Persons other than Patients and Staff

The provisions of common law dividing people into the categories of invitees, licensees and trespassers with corresponding though questionable gradations of duty towards them in respect of the safety of the premises on which they enter for adequate treatment require discussion and analysis beyond the scope of these notes. Broadly, however, hospital authorities are well advised to act on the assumption that they are likely to be held liable to pay damages in respect of injury to anyone lawfully on the premises if such injury is due to the unsafe condition of the premises or to the negligence of any member of the staff. An example that comes to mind is a caller who slipped on a mat on a polished floor and sustained serious injury thereby, the hospital having to pay heavy damages. Incidentally, trees which are in a dangerous condition owing to insufficient care and attention, if they or branches from them fall and injure anyone on the premises or on an adjacent road or premises, may be a source of liability.

Besides taking all reasonable precautions against accidents, hospital authorities should have an adequate system of recording the nature and circumstances of mishaps which may lead to a claim at a later date.

Jury Service—Exemption from

The obligation to accept jury service rests on all persons between the ages of 21 and 60 who own freehold land valued at £10 a year or more, or leaseholds valued at not less than £20 per annum for a period of not less than 21 years, and householders of premises the rateable value of which is not less than £30 in Middlesex or £20 elsewhere. Others liable to jury service are burgesses of certain boroughs. Persons over 60 years of age, although they may claim exemption, are not disqualified.

The above property qualification affords practical exemption from jury service to most residential staff at hospitals. Others who are exempt include practicing registered medical practitioners and superintendents and keepers of public mental hospitals. Pharmaceutical chemists (but not chemists and druggists) are also exempt, as well as any dentist who makes a claim. Midwives have now been added to the list of exemptions.

Libel and Slander

False defamatory statements in writing or other permanent or semi-permanent form, if published (i.e. communicated) to a person other than the one defamed, constitutes actionable libel unless on a privileged occasion. There need be no proof of special damage to the one defamed. Similar spoken defamatory statements (slander), are actionable on proof of special damage, and without such proof, inter alia, if touching a man's trade or profession, his conduct in or fitness for a public office or the chastity of a woman. Slander is in any case actionable on proof of special damage.

Certain communications, e.g. answers as a referee to a prospective employer of an employee or ex-employee of the person making or authorising the communication, are subject of qualified privilege, the effect in such cases being that a false defamatory statement which would otherwise constitute actionable libel is not so provided made honestly and without malice. Any intention to injure the party commented on, as distinct from the intention of performing the public social duty of advising a prospective employer who seeks the information of his deficiencies, defeats the plea of privilege and leaves the defendant under the onus of proving the truth of his allegation if he is to succeed in his defence. It is generally better not to volunteer adverse comments but to await a request from the prospective employer, and the answer to such enquiries, even though unequivocally adverse, should be couched in temperate language, excessive extravagance of expression possibly constituting evidence of malice. There may be occasions when it is considered expedient to refuse to give a testimonial or to answer enquiries as a referee, leaving the refusal to tell its own tale. This in itself gives no cause of action. To damn with faint praise is another expedient but it should not be resorted to when something definite is known against the employee, e.g. if he has been dishonest, since if the prospective employer were misled to his detriment he might have a cause of action against the giver of the testimonial or referee.

Qualified privilege—referred to above in respect of testimonials and references—extends also to many other communications made in performance of a legal, moral or social duty, and with the same effect. Absolute privilege covers inter alia statements made in Parliament and in the course of legal proceedings. When a statement is covered by absolute privilege the maker is absolutely protected against any action based on it, whether or not it was malicious and whether or not he knew of its falsity.

Master and Servant

In this outline of the law the word master is used in its broad legal sense as meaning any employer or employing authority, and the word servant as meaning any employed person working under a contract of service. For the purposes of some statutes referring to the Civil Service and to local government, the expression officer has been contradistinguished from servant, the former comprising employees other than manual and domestic workers established for superannuation purposes, and the latter comprising the remainder of the staff, who might or might not be established. Yet again, as in the Asylums Officers' Superannuation Act, 1909, the expression " officer or servant " is used throughout without any attempt at differentiation. Fortunately, so far as employment under the National Health Service Act, 1946, is concerned, the dichotomy is abandoned, it being expressly laid down in section 79 that " officer includes servant." So for the purposes of this outline the two expressions will be regarded as interchangeable since we shall be mainly concerned with employment under that Act. But except so far as otherwise indicated, what is said will equally apply to employment by a voluntary hospital, convalescent home or kindred institution.

Engagement. Ordinarily there is no obligation in law to reduce a contract of service to writing, unless for an initial period of upwards of one year but it is certainly desirable to do so in order to avoid all occasion for subsequent misunderstanding as to the rights and duties of the parties to it. If the agreement is reduced to writing, then it will ordinarily attract stamp duty of 6d. Contracts in the nature of apprenticeship, as of student nurses, if in writing or by deed, must be stamped 2s. 6d. Contracts of service of menial servants (e.g. domestics) and of manual workers are exempt from stamp duty.

The agreement made should cover all the normal incidents of the employment, such as the duties to be performed, hours, rate of remuneration and intervals of payment, whether and under what conditions there is pay during sick leave, holidays and notice. To an increasing extent such matters as rates of remuneration, overtime, sick leave and holidays, for officers employed in the National Health Service, will be determined through the National Whitley Councils which have been set up for the purpose, and as regards such matters as may be covered by such national agreement it suffices in any service agreement to refer to the terms and conditions which may be laid down from time to time by the appropriate National Whitley Council for the grade in question. Matters not so dealt with and upon which agreement is necessary may either be incorporated directly in the agreement or indirectly by reference over to rules or standing orders. Except so far as national rates and conditions are embodied by reference over in a service agreement it is desirable that the person engaged should be provided with a copy of the terms and conditions, including al relevant standing orders.

Transferred officers, i.e. staff in hospital service before the appointed day, have the option of remaining subject to their pre-transfer salary scales and conditions of service as to hours, holidays, sick leave, etc., the alternative being to accept the terms and conditions laid down by the Ministry of Health for such grade in the new service, entering the new scale at a point corresponding with their previous salary. This reference to terms and conditions laid down by the Ministry is an apparent rather than a real contradiction of what has been said about settlement of conditions of service by national agreement, such scales and conditions as have been laid down unilaterally being subject to review by the appropriate National Whitley Council and it being understood that the Minister will implement agreed decisions of such Council or of arbitrators referred to in default of agreement.

Sick Leave. Unless the contract of service otherwise provides and except in the case of a person employed on an hourly basis or of a trade custom to the contrary, absence on account of sickness does not give the employer the right to stop the servant's pay or any part of it. In the hospital service the amount of sick leave on full pay and on half pay is now ordinarily laid down in national conditions of service for all grades, less, in the case of leave on full pay, the amount the officer is entitled to receive under the National Insurance Act, 1946, or the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, during incapacity.

Holidays. Apart from nationally agreed conditions, for certain grades entitlement to leave on Christmas Day and Good Friday, and on other public and bank holidays may be a recognised custom, but with such exceptions holidays, including annual leave, are only a right if an agreed term of the contract.

Notice. It is desirable that the notice necessary to terminate an engagement in the ordinary course, and there being no grounds for dismissal without notice, should be laid down in the original agreement, but failing such provision an engagement may be terminated by reasonable notice. What is reasonable notice is a question of fact to be determined in the light of the particular circumstances and taking account of any generally recognised custom of the trade or calling concerned, but a particular hospital or other employing authority cannot establish a custom binding on its officers, e.g. that notice must be given to expire at the end of a week or month. Any employer desiring to modify the general rule that notice may effectively be given at any time must do so by express agreement.[1]

Notice: Established, pensionable officers. Unless there has been specific agreement to the contrary, any officer, whether pensionable or not and however long he may have been in his post, may have his services terminated at any time by the appropriate notice. This statement of an employing authority's strict legal rights must not be allowed to obscure the possible consequences in practice of lawful but unreasonable dismissal which may, for example, lead to a trade dispute and reference to the appeal machinery established by the National Whitley Councils for the Health Services or otherwise.

Dismissal without notice but with salary in lieu. Whenever an employing authority can lawfully terminate an officer's engagement by notice it is equally entitled to terminate it without notice on paying the dismissed officer the amount of the salary or wages he would have earned during the requisite period of notice in addition to any remuneration already due.[2] Apart from any agreement to the contrary a domestic servant so dismissed is not entitled to any payment in lieu of board and lodging, but in most other cases an officer dismissed with salary or wages in lieu of notice would be entitled also to the value of his emoluments for the appropriate period. The value, it is suggested, would be as fixed by agreement for purpose of superannuation. Moreover, if an officer is occupying a house or flat, quite apart from such protection as is afforded by the Rent Restriction Acts, he may be entitled to very substantial compensation if it is desired to terminate his occupation before the expiry of normal notice. It is always desirable to take legal advice before attempting to obtain possession of the accommodation otherwise than by mutual agreement.

Summary Dismissal. It is not practicable to give precise limits to the grounds which—apart from express agreement—justify summary dismissal without notice, the borderline being very indeterminate and—in a contested case—the issue normally being one of fact for the jury to determine. Broadly, however, it may be said that dishonesty in the course of a servant's duties, as by theft, embezzlement or the taking of bribes or secret commissions is always a valid ground; dishonesty even outside the course of his duties is usually also a ground for summary dismissal of a servant. Serious misconduct in the course of his employment is also a ground, though whether, say, any particular act of insubordination, disobedience or insolence justifies dismissal is a question of fact. Misconduct otherwise than in the course of his duties, if of a kind to make his continued employment prejudicial to his master's interests, may also justify a servant's dismissal. A servant may also be dismissed for incompetence. Illness, except in the case of temporary staff engaged for a specific emergency, is seldom a ground for summary dismissal.

In general terms it may be said that employing authorities are well advised to exercise the right of summary dismissal sparingly and only in the clearest cases. Generally, even when the employer feels there is just cause of complaint, it is better to avoid the possibility of challenge at law and an adverse verdict by giving notice or salary in lieu. But when summary dismissal is justified and resorted to, the discharged servant is not strictly entitled to any payment in respect of the period which has elapsed since the last regular pay day.

[1] Any employing authority should think seriously before attempting to impose such a condition since it might be excessively onerous, sometimes compelling a member of the staff to give what would, in effect, be nearly two months' notice instead of one. Staff so penalised may be disgruntled and their work adversely affected.

[2] There are possible exceptions to this general rule but not of a kind ever likely to concern hospital authorities.

If a servant is unjustly dismissed the amount of salary or wages for the appropriate period of notice and the valuation of emoluments for the same period (reserving always the subject of compensation for disturbance of occupation in certain cases already touched upon) is ordinarily the maximum damages obtained by the aggrieved employee on that account. Moreover, he is under a duty to minimise the loss by taking any suitable employment and his damages are reducible accordingly. [N.B.—This leaves aside any possibility of a right to claim damages for defamation, as to which see Libel and Slander and Testimonials and References.]

Servant leaving without notice. An officer is not entitled to leave without notice—otherwise than for just cause (e.g. the master's breach of his side of the contract)—and to discharge his obligation by payment of the amount of salary for the period of notice, but is liable to reimburse the employer the financial loss he has suffered by the servant's breach of contract. That loss may be greater or less than the salary for the period of notice and it is the employer's duty to minimise it. In practice, in any but the most exceptional cases, an action against an officer for breach of contract is hardly worth while, especially if the officer has tendered a reasonable amount as compensation (e.g. salary for the period of notice). Any just dissatisfaction with the officer's conduct is better expressed through any testimonial or reference (q.v.) called for.

Nuisance

To interfere with another person's enjoyment of his property by noise, fumes, smells, overhanging trees, etc., is a private nuisance for which damages and, if necessary, an injunction is the appropriate remedy. But the interference, to be actionable, must be substantial judged by ordinary standards and taking into account the nature of the neighbourhood. Moreover, that the occupier of the premises adversely affected uses those premises for purposes requiring, say, a more than normal freedom from noise, vibration, smells or fumes, is not allowed to increase the legal burden on his neighbours.

Trees, overhanging. Generally the only effective remedy for overhanging trees if the owner of the property on which they grow refuses or neglects to lop them on request, is for the owner of the property adversely affected to lop them. He should not, however, cut them back beyond the boundary fence nor keep the pieces lopped off if of any significant value. Trees such as yews which are poisonous to some domestic animals, such as horses, present a special problem. Hospital authorities with such trees in their grounds should see that they are cut back sufficiently far from the boundary to prevent animals on adjoining land or highway from reaching them. It is also important if the hospital is under any obligation to repair the boundary fences or hedges that this should be duly attended to. Failing such precautions there is a serious risk of liability if an animal is injured or killed through eating the poisonous foliage.

Ancient Lights. Apart from express agreement, the right to a reasonable amount of light to a particular window is obtained only by 20 years' uninterrupted enjoyment, but since an interruption to be effective must be for a whole year, the right is in practice obtained as a result of a minimum enjoyment for 19 years and 1 day, but enforceable only after the full 20 years. This right to light, even if established, does not altogether prevent building on the adjoining land but only the erection of any structure which reduces the light enjoyed by the dominant tenement below what is reasonable, judged by ordinary standards. Hence, there can be no prescriptive right to a sufficiency of light for a particular purpose requiring more than that to which there is entitlement within the foregoing limitations. A right to enjoyment of such additional amount of light as may be necessary for a particular purpose can be acquired only by express grant. Finally, it may be noted that possession of " ancient lights " confers no right to continued enjoyment of a particular view or against the erection of structures which may be blots on the landscape. Unless these matters are covered by town planning or local building regulations or are the subject of effective restrictive covenants, it is difficult to suggest any remedy.

Nurses' Uniform

The General Nursing Council, under its statutory powers, has prescribed uniforms which may be worn by nurses on the various parts of the Register and by State Enrolled Assistant Nurses. It is an offence to wear such uniform without being entitled to do so. The Royal College of Nursing and some other voluntary bodies also authorise a uniform for their members. The wearing of such a uniform without justification and with intent to deceive would probably be actionable, and might—in some circumstances—be an offence.

Operations, Surgical Procedures, Internal and External Examinations

Ordinarily operations, surgical procedures and medical examinations should be undertaken only with the consent of the patient or in the case of a person under a disability such as infancy, mental deficiency or insanity, with the consent of his parent, guardian or other person responsible in law for his care. Infancy exists in law until the age of 21, but probably infants of 16 years and upwards may give valid consent on their own account, though the consent of the parent or guardian is desirable when it can be obtained.

If a patient whose consent to an urgent operation should be obtained is unable to give it as, for example, because unconscious as a result of illness or accident, then it is safe to proceed on the authority of the nearest relative available or, if none be available, without such consent.

In the case of a married woman in a condition to express her wishes, her husband's consent to an operation on her is not required even though the operation is one which, if performed will possibly result in sterility, but his concurrence and co-operation on other than legal grounds are obviously desirable.

The position regarding mental patients is somewhat complex, but it is the present writer's view that in the case of a mental patient in an institution the responsibility for his mental and physical care rests on the medical superintendent, who can accordingly give the necessary consent. It is desirable, however, also to obtain the concurrence of the petitioning or nearest relative. The position is similar as regards certified mental defectives, though in the case of defectives received into an institution at the request of parent or guardian it is suggested that the parent's or guardian's consent to any operation be requested.

Patients' Property—Loss of or Damage to

Whilst hospitals should as far as practicable disclaim responsibility for custody of patients' property, and arrange as far as possible that property of value should not be brought into hospital, it is inevitable that hospitals should take charge of patients' clothing and also, on occasion, of valuables such as money and jewellery. If liability for loss of or damage to such property is to be avoided it is desirable that there should be an adequate records system and also storage accommodation appropriate to the articles concerned. Moreover, when such property is handed back to the patient, his acknowledgment should, if possible, be obtained or other evidence of the transaction recorded.

If property of but modest value (e.g. an umbrella) is left behind by a patient and reasonable efforts to contact the patient by letter in order to hand it back prove abortive, it is usually reasonable to treat the property as abandoned and to dispose of it. That course is not, however, advisable in the case of things of greater value such as jewellery, when there might be a successful claim after the thing had been disposed of. It is by no means certain that the price obtained, had the thing already been sold by the hospital at the time of the claim, would be the measure of damages.

A hospital authority is not responsible for damage to a patient's property by fire, flood, etc., unless such damage can be attributed to the negligence of the hospital staff.

Pay Beds and Beds available on Part Payment

So far as National Health Service hospitals are concerned reference should be made to ss. 4 and 5 of the National Health Service Act, 1946, and to the National Health Service (Pay-Bed Accommodation in Hospitals, etc.) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1490). The power of a voluntary hospital to make charges depends on its constitution and, in certain circumstances, modifications to permit charges are possible under the Voluntary Hospitals (Paying Patients) Act, 1936.

Penicillin Act, 1947

This Act puts substantially the same imitations on supply of penicillin and certain analogous substances to the public and on their use for treatment of disease as do the Dangerous Drugs Acts in respect of substances to which those Acts relate. The substances to which the 1947 Act relates are penicillin (including preparations of that substance) and such other anti-microbial organic substances as may be prescribed, and any other substance the chemical properties of which are similar to those of a prescribed substance although not produced by a living organism. At the date of writing the only additional anti-microbial organic substance is streptomycin. Hospitals, clinics and nursing homes may nevertheless obtain supplies without restriction, but such supplies when obtained may be used by way of treatment only on the direction of a registered medical or dental practitioner, being supplied to patients only on prescription. Provision is also made for the supply of such substances for the purpose of scientific education and research.

Poisons and Dangerous Drugs

Poisons—Supply of by Hospitals. Public and charitable hospitals may supply medicines containing poisons within the Pharmacy and Poisons Act, 1933, on a doctor's or dentist's prescription, subject to the keeping of the prescribed records and to the following additional rules: (i) the container must bear a designation and address sufficient to identify the hospital or clinic; (ii) in the case of liniments, etc., such descriptive word, together with the words " For external use only " must appear on the label; (iii) except when a medicine is made up ready for use the label must include the word " Poison."

Poisons—Supply and Storage of in Hospitals. If in a hospital or similar institution there is a dispensing department, poisons are to be supplied for use within the institution only on the written order of a doctor, a dentist, or the sister in charge of the ward or department. The container must be labelled with the name of the contents and in the case of a substance in the First Schedule to the Poisons Rules the container must bear an indication that it is to be stored in a cupboard or on a shelf reserved for the storage of poisons, and there must be such a cupboard in every ward where such poisons are kept. If there is no dispensing department, all poisons prior to issue for use within the institution are to be in charge of a person appointed for the purpose by the governing body or person in control.

Arrangements must be made for regular inspection of places where poisons are stored.

Dangerous Drugs—Exemptions in favour of Hospitals. Public authority and voluntary hospitals are exempt from the general regulations forbidding possession, supply, etc., of dangerous drugs provided such drugs are dispensed by a medical practitioner or a qualified pharmacist and the necessary records are kept. Orders must be signed by a doctor or qualified pharmacist and dangerous drugs must be dispensed for individual patients only on a fresh prescription of a medical practitioner each time. Stock preparations for ward use are to be supplied only on requisition of the sister in charge and she must keep them in a locked cupboard, using them for individual patients only on the direction of one of the medical practitioners in charge of the patients. Proper precautions must be taken to prevent theft of dangerous drugs whilst being conveyed from the dispensary to wards, theatres or out-patient department.

If a hospital is not organised and staffed so as to qualify for exemption under the Dangerous Drugs (Hospitals General Exemption) Order, 1924, exemption may yet be obtained on individual application if the dispensary is in charge of a dispenser holding the Certificate of the Society of Apothecaries or the appropriate R.A.M.C. qualification.

Where there is no exemption, dangerous drugs for use in an institution may be obtained only on order of a medical practitioner who attends patients there, and are to be kept by the matron (or acting matron) under lock and key, to be used only in accordance with doctor's orders. She must keep proper records.

Post-Mortems

Post-mortems (or anatomical examinations or autopsies) to ascertain cause of death before issue of death certificate should be undertaken only on the instructions of the coroner, or at least with his approval. And even when the cause of death is known, there should be no post-mortem examination without the coroner's instructions or approval if the circumstances are such that an inquest is or may be necessary. The principal cases in which an inquest is necessary are when there is reasonable cause to suspect a violent or unnatural death, or when the cause of death is unknown. Deaths in prison and also—if there are suspicious circumstances—in mental hospitals, are likewise subject of an inquest, and all deaths of patients in a mental hospital have to be reported to the coroner.

Post-mortems otherwise than in coroners' cases, i.e. post-mortem examinations in pursuit of scientific knowledge, are lawful only if in accordance with the provisions of the Anatomy Acts. The principal rules are as follows:—(i) the examination may be undertaken only by a person duly licensed and at a place notified in accordance with the Acts; (ii) the permission of the person in possession of the body is essential, but on the other hand the right of the relatives is purely negative (i.e. that they can forbid dissection); (iii) a certificate of cause of death must accompany the body; (iv) removal for dissection must not take place within 48 hours of death; (v) the licensed person is under the obligation of giving various notices and making returns, and also of providing for burial within a year. The Anatomy Acts make no provision for retention of bodies or parts of bodies as specimens, though, apparently, retention of parts of the body without disfiguring it are not ordinarily made the subject of a charge.

Professional Qualifications

Professional qualifications are broadly of three kinds:

(a) those recognised by statute as being essential to the pursuit of a particular calling, e.g. in the case of dentists and midwives, entry on the register being a prerequisite of lawful practice of dentistry or of midwifery (otherwise than by a registered medical practictioner or in case of emergency);

(b) those recognised by statute as conferring certain privileges on the holder but not giving exclusive right to practise, e.g. registered medical practitioners and nurses recognised under the Nurses Act, 1943. In the case of registered medical practitioners the privileges in respect of possession and use of drugs and issue of many well-nigh essential certificates are so great as to secure them a virtual monopoly, whilst (apart from maternity nursing) the privilege of nurses recognised under the Act of 1943 amounts to little more than the apparently exclusive use of the title "nurse," even that privilege being subject to provisos which weaken it considerably in practice;

(c) voluntary qualifications. The class includes all qualifications, even though conferred by an organisation established by Statute or Charter, not essential in law to the practice of the profession to which they relate, nor conferring substantial privileges in law on those in possession of them, as contrasted with persons not possessing the qualification in question. As examples of this class may be mentioned qualifications in physiotherapy, radiography, medical laboratory technology and the like, though it is conceivable that in the near future radiographers having, say, the M.S.R. might be given privileges bringing them into class (a) or (b) supra.

Although it is in law most important that a person should have a qualification he is required to have by statute for a particular calling, it is in practice hardly less important that persons performing expert functions for which a voluntary qualification is appropriate should have that qualification if an employing hospital authority is to avoid excessive responsibility for injuries to patients due to incompetence, as to which see further under Injuries to Patients. It is advisable, too, not merely to ascertain that a person applying for a post for which a particular qualification is necessary or desirable possesses a certificate purporting to show that he has that qualification, but that he is in fact the person referred to in the certificate produced.

See also heads of the various professions for which there are statutory qualifications.

Chemists and Druggists—see Pharmacists

Dentists. To be entitled to practise dentistry a person must be entered on the register of dentists kept by the General Medical Council. The description " dental surgeon " is properly restricted to persons possessing the qualification awarded by certain examining bodies such as the Royal College of Surgeons of England and the corresponding examining body for Scotland, and to persons holding a university degree in dental surgery, thus distinguishing dentists holding these examination qualifications from those registered by reason of practical experience, often referred to as "1928 Dentists."

Medical practitioners. The privileges given in law to medical practitioners, e.g. in relation to the issue of prescriptions for poisons and dangerous drugs, the giving of medical certificates for various purposes, participation in the National Health Service, are confined to registered medical practitioners, i.e. persons whose names, by virtue of possessing an acceptable medical qualification, are entered on the register of medical practitioners kept by the General Medical Council. This minimum requirement, however, gives no guarantee that any practitioner is fit to undertake a particular specialty for which possession of a higher qualification and post-graduate experience may be appropriate. As to the method of appointment of medical staff of hospitals within the National Health Service see National Health Service (Appointment of Specialists) Regulations, 1948, and as to qualifications of medical practitioners taking part in the provision of supplementary ophthalmic services see the National Health Service (Supplementary Ophthalmic Service) Regulations, 1948.

Nurses. Only persons recognised as nurses under the provisions of the Nurses Act, 1943, are entitled to use the descriptive title "nurse," which, where necessary, must be accompanied by such limiting or descriptive word as "assistant" or "sick children's." But although it is an offence for a person wrongly to use the title "nurse" as applying to herself,[1] it is not an offence simply to be so addressed without having encouraged or required it.

The principal classes of nurse are as follows :

STATE REGISTERED NURSES :—

(a) General Trained—usually referred to simply as State Registered Nurses (S.R.N.) ; these, as present, are all female nurses but there is provision for inclusion of male nurses. When the necessary rules have been made.

(b) Male Nurses (R.M.N.) The essential difference between the training of a male nurse and of a female nurse on the general part of the register is the substitution in the male nurse syllabus of other things for maternity nursing and diseases of women, male nurses not being authorised to undertake maternity nursing.

NURSES ON THE GENERAL NURSING COUNCIL LIST UNDER S.18 OF THE NURSES ACT, 1943.

These are nurses who would have been entitled to State registration without examination had they applied in due time, and in respect of whom a list was opened (and is now closed) as an appendix to the Register referred to above, the list being arranged in appropriate "parts" as is the main register. It seems that "nurses" on this list have all the privileges of State Registered Nurses except possibly as regards maternity nursing and the wearing of the prescribed uniform. Persons on the list are entitled to the description "trained nurse". If, however, she is on a particular "part" of the list, e.g. "fever," this must be indicated by the use of the description "trained fever nurse." There is now provision for their transfer to the appropriate part of the Register.

STATE ENROLLED ASSISTANT NURSES (S.E.A.N.)

These are men and women who have qualified for the roll of assistant nurses kept by the General Nursing Council.

STUDENT NURSES

PUPIL ASSISTANT NURSE

Persons in training for a State Enrolled Assistant Nurse.

TRAINED NURSE

This description may be used by a person on the list kept under s.18 of the Nurses Act, 1943, and by one who has passed the examinations for the State Register but is under 21 years. If qualified, or qualified but by reason of age, otherwise than for the general part of the register or list, this must be indicated by appropriate words. Service trained nurses when out of the services may use the appropriate description such as "service trained male nurse."

MATERNITY NURSE

Subject to certain notices, State Certified Midwives and those deemed certified under Defence Regulations may use the description "maternity nurse."

Provision is also made for the appropriate description to be used by persons who have or are training for certain other nursing qualifications, such as the certificate of the Tuberculosis Association, the Royal Medico-Psychological Association, and the like. In addition, provision is made for reciprocal recognition of nursing qualifications awarded abroad.

Pharmacists. Members of the Pharmaceutical Society are entitled to the privilege in law of undertaking responsibility for the dispensing of poisons and dangerous drugs. This is broadly true in hospitals as well as elsewhere, though exceptionally, institutions with a dispenser holding the Apothecaries' Hall qualification or the appropriate R.A.M.C. qualification may be given individual exemption from compliance with the general requirements of the Dangerous Drugs Act, but see further under Dangerous Drugs, also Poisons, Penicillin Act, 1947, and Radioactive Substances Act, 1948.

All members of the Pharmaceutical Society are entitled to the designation "pharmacist," but within that general designation there is a subdivision into "chemists and druggists" (persons who have taken the ordinary standard examination of the Society) and "pharmaceutical chemists" or "pharmaceutists" (persons who have taken the more exacting examination leading to that qualification). In law there is no distinction between the privileges of "pharmaceutical chemists" and "chemists and druggists." Also it must be appreciated that with the increasing provision of courses in pharmacy leading to a university degree (B.Pharm.), students taking that degree may not bother to do more to obtain their formal registration with the Society than to complete the Society's minimum requirements, so that such a person, although on the Society's books as a "chemist and druggist" may be no less well qualified than those who have taken the alternative higher qualification.

Radioactive Substances Act, 1948

As from an appointed day yet to be fixed at the time of writing (February, 1951), this Act provides for a strict control of the manufacture, supply and use of radioactive substances and the use of irradiating apparatus for therapeutic purposes.

Substantially, so far as supply of radioactive substances and their use for treatment of human being is concerned, the Act provides for control on the lines of the Dangerous Drugs Acts. As under these Acts, hospitals, clinics and nursing homes will be able to obtain supplies, which may, however, be used for treatment of patients only by or under the direction of a medical practitioner or dentist duly licensed for the purpose. There is also power reserved in the Act to exempt other persons or classes of persons from the provisions of the Act and it may be that this power will in due course be used to permit properly trained technicians and nurses to use on or administer such substances to patients on the instruction of qualified medical or dental practitioners, but not under their immediate direction. It is difficult at this stage and before any regulations or orders have been issued to say more on the subject.

The use of irradiating apparatus (which may be a wider term than X-ray apparatus) for treatment of human beings is, from the appointed day, restricted to qualified medical and dental practitioners duly licensed for the purpose, or to persons acting in accordance with the instructions of such a practitioner. Use of irradiating apparatus for diagnosis as distinct from treatment is not directly restricted by the Act, but may be brought within its terms by regulation.

The Act also provides for the making of safety regulations in respect of occupations involving radioactive substances and irradiating apparatus and for powers of entry and inspection. Premises which are mainly residential can be entered and inspected without permission of the occupier only on a justice's warrant. In our view hospitals are residential premises, but the question is open to discussion.

Receipts

Ordinarily, receipts for amounts of £2 and upwards should bear a twopenny unappropriated inland revenue stamp, which may take the form of a postage stamp or stamps to that value provided they are properly cancelled with the date or the signature of the person giving the receipt. Whenever a receipt, if given, would attract stamp duty it is an offence to refuse or neglect to give a receipt on demand.

Stamp Duty—Exemptions. Receipts given by hospital authorities established under the National Health Service Act, 1946, or the National Health Service (Scotland) Act, 1947, viz. Regional Hospital Boards, Boards of Governors of teaching hospitals, Hospital Management Committees and Boards of Management, are exempt from Stamp Duty under the first schedule of the Stamp Act, 1891, provided such receipts are given in respect of moneys for which the hospital authority is accountable to the Exchequer (e.g. payments made by paying or part-paying patients under ss. 4 and 5 of the 1946 Act). But receipts for moneys constituting endowments or income of endowments (e.g. rent of land constituting an endowment) are not exempt from stamp duty. Although there is no legal authority for it, exemption is in practice also conceded to receipts for charitable gifts, though if the payer or donor demands a properly stamped receipt it should be given.

Also exempt from stamp duty under the first schedule of the Stamp Act, 1891, are officers' receipts given to their employing authority for salaries, wages and expenses, and the view of the Ministry of Health is that this exemption extends to receipts given by members of hospital authorities and their committees for payments in respect of travelling expenses, subsistence allowance and loss of remunerative time.

Voluntary hospitals enjoy no exemption in respect of stamps on receipts they may give otherwise than the practical exemption of receipts for voluntary donations. Receipts given by their staff for salaries, wages and expenses fall within the exemption mentioned in the last paragraph.

Cheques. Cheques issued by Regional Hospital Boards, Boards of Governors of teaching hospitals, Hospital Management Committees and Boards of Governors, are not exempt from Stamp Duty and must bear a twopenny unappropriated Inland Revenue stamp.

Search—see under Theft

Shop Acts

Any hospital which carries on a retail trade or business, e.g. shop where staff or patients can supply their needs, must comply with the conditions as to hours, staff conditions, etc., as laid down in the Acts and the regulations and orders made thereunder.

Testimonials and References

There is no obligation on an employer to give an employee or ex-employee a testimonial, or to answer enquiries about him, but to refuse a testimonial or the customary facility for reference is oppressive except where justified by the dishonesty or grave misconduct of the person concerned. Provided an employer or ex-employer or an officer of an employing or ex-employing authority states honestly and on proper occasion what he believes to be the truth concerning the ability and character of the person to whom the testimonial or reference relates neither the employer nor the officer giving the testimonial or answering as referee is liable in damages even though defamatory statements made are false. But if the false defamatory statements are made otherwise than on a proper occasion and to a person properly interested (such as a prospective employer) there is no protection from an action for libel or slander. The necessary communication to subordinates, e.g. to a shorthand-typist, is also privileged, but not excessively wide publication as, for example, by putting the answer to an inquiry in the wrong envelope. See also under Libel and Slander.

Theft

Prosecution. Theft in hospital, whether by staff, patients or callers, is a troublesome problem. If the culprit is discovered, the evidence being beyond all reasonable doubt, the problem reduces itself to one of policy rather than law. The hospital authority is under no obligation to prosecute [1] though it must not make an agreement with the thief not to do so on condition that he hands back or assists in recovery of the stolen property, for this would be compounding a felony. However, provided no such agreement is made, the hospital may properly take the thief's subsequent restitution or help in recovery into account in reaching a decision. If a hospital does decide to prosecute, the costs of the prosecution will fall on the hospital authority. But the hospital authority cannot prevent the police prosecuting if the case has come to their notice and they consider it appropriate to do so.

Search. If there are thefts which have not been brought home to a particular person though there is someone suspect, it is important that the greatest care should be exercised not to publish unfounded charges. If a course of wrongdoing is suspected the best plan is probably to report the known facts to the police, and any reasonable suspicions and the basis therefor, and invite their co-operation. But it may be that there are grave suspicions that a particular employee, or possibly a patient, is taking stolen goods off the premises and it may be desired to catch him redhanded. Then the idea of a search is very attractive, but the attraction must usually be resisted since hospital authorities have no greater right of search without warrant than any private person, and should anyone be wrongfully detained and searched, there being no stolen goods found on him, the hospital authority and its officers concerned would probably be mulcted of heavy damages. Moreover, any false defamatory statement uttered as alleged justification for the search might itself constitute a separate actionable wrong. Some employers do make it a condition of employment that employees will submit to search when required to do so, but even if a hospital authority made such condition and the employee, in the event, refused to submit to search, it is doubtful whether he could be compelled to do so. Probably in the circumstances the refusal would itself constitute a ground for dismissal without notice and that is all.

Arrest. If a theft or embezzlement is discovered, an officer of the hospital authority acting on its behalf may detain the wrongdoer, but only for so long as is reasonably necessary to charge him and hand him over to the police.

Trespassers

A trespasser is a person without the express or implied permission of the occupier and without lawful justification or excuse on premises (such as a hospital or private house and including the grounds) in occupation of another. Such a person may be ordered off the premises by the occupier or his servant or agent and, if he refuses to go, may be removed with the exercise of such reasonable force as is necessary. Excessive force in removing a trespasser, or any personal assault on him not reasonably necessary in self defence, will give the trespasser a cause of action for damages. Similarly, it is not permissible to set a trap to injure unwary trespassers and liability will be incurred if anyone is injured thereby. If a trespasser refuses to leave when asked to do so and resists or threatens to resist removal, it is wise, where practicable, to seek the co-operation of the police.

Truck Acts

It is generally forbidden by the Truck Acts to pay manual labourers other than domestic and menial servants, in kind, though deduction from wages of the real value of meals supplied on the premises is permitted if there is an agreement in writing to that effect. Deduction of fines either by written agreement or in accordance with a conspicuous notice is also permitted.

The scope of the exception as to domestic and menial servants has caused some uncertainty from time to time. In one case, a voluntary hospital engineer-stoker was held to be within the exception. It cannot, however, be assumed that the decision in that case would necessarily be followed if the defendant were a hospital taken over by the Minister of Health.

Uranium Parts. These are now supplied to hospitals only on hire and are subject to the relevant provisions of the Atomic Energy Act, 1946. (vide Ministry circular R.H.B.(50) 11; H.M.C.(50) 11; B.G.(50) 10.)

Young Persons, Employment of

The hours and conditions of work of young persons in certain employments, such as collection and delivery of goods, and as outside messengers, is governed by the Young Persons (Employment) Act, 1939. There are also provisions for the protection of young persons in the Factories Acts and—though not so likely to affect hospitals—in the Education Act, 1944. This is a subject on which it is well to seek the advice of the local factory inspector.

[1] For formal completeness it may be observed that if goods stolen have been sold in market overt they can generally be recovered only if the thief has been prosecuted to conviction.

			made out of Exchequer moneys. The scheme is not funded but is subjected to actuarial investigation periodically. The scheme is designed to provide benefits comparable with those applicable in the case of an established civil servant under the Superannuation Act, 1918–1946. The major benefits are a pension and a lump sum retiring allowance, together with a widow's pension. Subsidiary benefits include a death gratuity, an incapacity pension, an injury allowance, a short service gratuity and an option to a pensioner to allocate part of his pension to his wife or any dependant. Provision is made for preserving the rights in respect of previous superannuable service of persons who become participants in the scheme on being transferred under the Act of 1946 to the central health service. In addition, superannuable employment in the central health service is made interchangeable with superannuable service in the Civil Service, the Local Government Service and the Teaching Service. The scheme also extends and modifies the Local Government Superannuation Act, 1937, in its application to local health authorities and other superannuation schemes administered by local health authorities under local Acts substituting benefits similar to those provided by the Regulations for the benefits of the Act of 1937 or those local Act schemes in relation to superannuable employees on the medical and nursing staff of the local health authorities and to any other classes of superannuable employees designated by the Minister. General Objectives

The aim of undergraduate medical education must be to guide medical students to such development of mind and character as will enable them when qualified to give maximum service to the community. To this end the student's training should provide a university education on broad and liberal lines, scientific in character with the stress on principles and methods, with bias as to subjects according to the needs of the future general practitioner.

Unit of Organisation

The unit of undergraduate teaching should be the medical teaching centre consisting of a university medical school, a group of teaching hospitals (parent and associated) and appropriate clinics of the local health service. Each medical school should be a separate legal entity in association with a university the three extramural schools in Scotland being abolished.

While the governing body of each constituent institution of a teaching centre retains full authority in its own field of responsibility, the policy, administration and activities of the constituent parts should be so interrelated that the institutions function as one in the field of medical education and research. To this end it is suggested (a) that the medical school should be represented on the governing bodies of parent and associated teaching hospitals and vice versa, (b) an exchange of representatives between parent and associated hospitals should be encouraged, (c) a joint advisory body should be established to advise on all medical staff appointments other than to university chairs, readerships, etc., in respect of which there should be consultation with the hospital, (d) all persons who teach medical students whether at parent or associated hospital to be on staff of medical school, (e) a proportion of the medical staff to hold appointments at more than one hospital.

Administrative Pattern

The parent hospital must have a governing body personal to the hospital. If it is a local authority hospital this would involve appointment by the local authority of a separate committee of management for that hospital, having the widest possible discretion in the expenditure of its budget and not tied rigidly to detailed allocations, determined by the local authority.

The full members of the medical staff of any teaching hospital should have complete individual responsibility for the clinical management of their patients. The advice sought by the governing body on medical matters should be that of the medical staff as a whole, expressed through a medical committee. If there is a medical superintendent he should not have executive powers in respect of the clinical management of patients, except in so far as such powers are delegated to him on the advice of the medical staff of the hospital.

Facilities for Clinical Instruction

As an optimum, schools with an entry of 100 students a year are recommended, having access to 950-1,000 hospital beds and to out-patient departments, laboratories and clinics. Local authority hospitals for infectious and for mental diseases must be included and as a rule the inclusion of one or more local authority general hospitals as full partners will be very beneficial in securing a comprehensive range of teaching resources.

The group of teaching hospitals associated with a medical school must include at least one parent teaching hospital which forms the focus of the arrangements for clinical instruction. The admission of patients to it must be selective and controlled in the interests of teaching.

Staff in Clinical Departments, including Pathology

The following changes are considered necessary to remedy the defects inherent in the present system, (a) the creation of more whole-time appointments in all grades, senior, intermediate and junior, (b) the adoption of new machinery for the selection of clinical teachers and members of the staffs of teaching hospitals, coupled with arrangements to minimise "in-breeding," (c) the payment of salaries to clinical teachers in respect of defined duties, (d) the reorganisation of the educational work of the clinical departments on the basis of at least each clinical division having an academic head.

Remuneration of Clinical Teachers

If it becomes the practice to pay the medical staffs of hospitals, part-time teachers should be paid a joint salary for the dual appointment, being greater than that paid to a non-teaching clinician of corresponding status. Except in the case of professorial and similar university appointments, the medical school and the other constituent parts of the teaching centre should consult in fixing joint salaries and proportion to be paid by each.

Staff Required

No common pattern suggested, but for bedside teaching, no teacher should be responsible for more than six to eight students.

There should be an adequate staff of non-medical technical assistants, for whose recruitment and training the universities should accept responsibility and for whom there should be a national scale of salaries and superannuation.

Women Students

Co-education should be the rule, and grants from public funds should be conditional on acceptance of a reasonable proportion of women students. There should be no sex bar in the making of hospital appointments.

Selection and Financial Assistance

Selection should not be merely on examination results. There should be an interview and consideration of confidential reports on previous career.

Grants to students should be adequate, no suitable secondary school pupil being prevented by lack of means from studying medicine.

Pre-Medical and Pre-Clinical Students

Detailed proposals are made under these heads affecting staffing and curriculum both of secondary schools and university colleges. Generally in London pre-clinical training should be provided at the medical school.

Pathology

The better staffing of pathological divisions with a professor at the head of each of the four departments is suggested. Students should be well-grounded in fundamentals, but not be expected to acquire detailed knowledge or technical skill.

General Clinical Instructions—Medicine, Surgery, and Obstetrics and Gynaecology

Six chapters are devoted to this, the keynote being that the bulk of students should be trained as family doctors, and more attention should therefore be paid to general medicine, minor ailments, early stages of disease, chronic and infectious diseases, and rehabilitation. There should be adequate training in midwifery and gynaecology. In surgery the technical details of operative measures are matters of post-graduate study; undergraduates should learn general principles and the treatment of those conditions commonly met in general practice.

The recommendation is made that at teaching hospitals medical students should have the first claim on midwifery cases, pupil midwives being accepted only if there is a surplus. Otherwise they should train at non-teaching hospitals.

Psychiatry

Whether he is dealing with problems of health or sickness, a medical practitioner cannot fully understand his patients or advise and treat them adequately unless he pays due attention to their psychological background. The training in psychiatry has failed to keep pace with the growing realisation of the important place which the subject should occupy in medical thought and practice. In future, every medical teaching centre must have an active department of psychiatry, the work and teaching of which are related to the work and teaching of the other departments.

Detailed proposals are made to this end, including the linking up of the mental hospitals with the work of the teaching centres.

Compulsory Pre-Registration House Appointments

After passing the final qualifying examination and before being allowed to enter independent medical practice, every medical student should be required to serve as a junior house officer for a period of twelve months in one or more approved hospitals.

General Medical Council

The Council should employ inspectors to visit medical teaching centres and report on courses of study, staffing, accommodation, equipment, arrangements and facilities for undergraduate medical education, the inspectors' reports and comments of the Council and of the institutions concerned being communicated to the University Grants Committee.

Final Examinations

The Universities of London, Oxford and Cambridge should reconsider the standard of their final examination and should introduce some "internal" features. Every medical school should provide a single organised course based upon university requirements which it should be compulsory for the student to complete before presenting himself for examination.

Curriculum

A drastic overhaul of the medical curriculum is an urgent necessity, and its accomplishment might be made a condition to be satisfied before any increase is made in Exchequer grant in aid of undergraduate medical education.

Post-Graduate Medical Education and Research

The five chapters devoted to these subjects are too detailed to be effectively summarised here, but it may be said that serious dissatisfaction is expressed with the present position and suggestion made for the determination of qualification and standards of specialist status by suitable central machinery, the primary requisite being approved specialist post-graduate training after satisfactory general clinical experience in hospital appointments. The position with regard to the award of existing post-graduate diplomas, except the M.R.C.P. and the F.R.C.S., are generally regarded as unsatisfactory.

Development of research work through the Medical Research Council, the medical schools, teaching hospitals and post-graduate institutes, is proposed and financial and administrative suggestions are made to that end. Medical research should also be supported at non-teaching hospitals, particularly those approved for pre-registration house appointments.

Finance

Very substantial additional sums will be required annually for medical education. The teaching hospitals are indispensable to the work and should receive grants towards both recurrent and capital expenditure. Ultimately amounts should be fixed and grants out of block grant received from the University Grants Commission made by the universities on application of the medical schools on behalf of their respective teaching centres, these grants being additional to those in respect of participation of the hospital in the national health service.

All hospitals throughout Great Britain should adopt a uniform accounting system, including costing.

King Edward's Hospital Fund

MEMORANDUM ON HOSPITAL DIET

King Edward's Hospital Fund for London, 10 Old Jewry, London, E.C.2. (Published July, 1943.)

At the outset the memorandum comments on the wide variation in practice in regard to (a) the quality and quantity of food provided, (b) methods adopted for preparing and serving food, and (c) the application to the diet of nutritional principles. As to (a) it is noted that it was formerly the practice to provide only one full meal a day, the remaining meals (notably breakfast and supper) consisting principally of bread, margarine, tea and soup, supplemented by such provisions as the patients' relatives brought in. It followed that a patient not so assisted might actually lack sufficient food. The Committee adds that it is not easy to justify the practice of leaving the patients to provide staple articles of diet, but notes that it is more and more the practice to provide all necessary food, and also cooked breakfasts and suppers. The cautious wording of the commendation inevitably suggests to the reader that we are yet far from universal recognition and acceptance of this responsibility by hospitals.

In the body of the report there is a strong recommendation that the substantial cooked breakfast should be given at a normal hour such as 8 a.m. and after nursing attention, when the patient is more likely to have an appetite for an adequate meal. The early morning cup of tea on waking is also commended. A reasonable, if restricted, choice of food is advocated particularly in the interests of the patient who may have a strong dislike for certain dishes. General ward diets are stated in some cases to be many years behind the times.

The second section of the report is devoted to the organisation of the catering department, and contains observations on the importance both of good buying and of good cooking, demonstrating by examples that it is false economy to try to save on wages of kitchen staff. One large hospital with a food bill of £20,000, by increasing its expenditure on kitchen salaries and wages from £1,000 to £2,000, actually showed a saving of £6,000 as well as a general improvement in diet. Importance of adequate modern kitchen equipment generally is stressed.

It is stated that the officer in charge of catering should either be a dietitian with adequate experience in large scale catering or else should act in full consultation with a dietitian. In the following paragraphs it is proposed that a catering committee should be set up in each hospital, the membership of which would include representatives of the house committee and of the medical staff, the house governor or secretary, the matron and the dietitian, with the catering officer as secretary, thereby implying that the dietitian would not be catering officer.

The recommendation is made that every hospital should have the services of a qualified dietitian to plan and supervise preparation and service of meals—small hospitals being grouped for this purpose. An alternative suggestion is that the King's Fund should offer dietetic advice to hospitals which express a wish for it.

An appendix to the memorandum contains the results of an investigation of actual meals served to patients and nurses at the three general hospitals of medium size which agreed to co-operate in the investigation. The results in terms of calories, fat, calcium, iron, and vitamins in the food served were found to be not altogether satisfactory.

Two further appendices deal respectively with an account of the setting up of a food service committee and the appointment of a dietitian as food supervisor at the General Infirmary at Leeds, and with group buying at the London Hospital.

King Edward's Hospital Fund

SECOND MEMORANDUM ON HOSPITAL DIET

King Edward's Hospital Fund for London 10, Old Jewry, London, E.C.2. (Published June, 1945.)

The second Memorandum appeared in June, 1945, incorporating the results of a further eighteen months' experience. "This experience," says the Memorandum, "has shown that there is an overwhelming case for making the Catering Department a separate unit of hospital constitution, controlled by a senior officer responsible to the Board of Management through the chief executive officer. Control must be unified if efficiency is to be achieved."

Function of the Catering Officer

The catering officer should be responsible for: buying of food; control of stores; menu planning (in co-operation with dietitian, if the catering officer is not qualified in this respect); cooking and service; and, in the larger hospitals it will not be possible for the catering officer to give personal attention to all these duties, and she will need an appropriate number of assistants. For example, buying for a large hospital requires the services of a whole-time buyer, but the responsibility for providing the right foods is carried by the catering officer. In respect to service it is not suggested that the catering officer should take over from the ward sister the service of meals to the patient, for the sister knows better than anyone the type of meals most suitable and the likes and dislikes of the individual patients. The catering officer should co-operate with the medical staff, whose responsibility it is to prescribe the diets, and with sisters in seeing that suitable meals are provided and that the equipment for satisfactory service is available.

Financial Control

Lack of proper financial control is all too frequently found to be a consequence of divided responsibility, says the Report. It also seems to be related, in not a few instances, to a poor standard of catering.

In catering establishments, other than hospitals and similar institutions, the quality of the meals served is commonly maintained by the reaction of the consumer who pays for them. Falling off in the quality of the food is quickly reflected in receipts. The fact that hospitals are not affected in this manner adds force to the needs for financial machinery that shall ensure economy without impairing quality.

It is apparent that to raise the standard of catering in hospitals will need more money, in some cases a great deal more than is now being spent on food, kitchen equipment and staff. If more is to be spent in this manner, the need for skilful economy at all stages of the catering chain becomes greater, although, in any case, it is a primary requirement of hospital administration. It has already been demonstrated in more than one hospital in recent years that reorganisation of the catering arrangements involving payment of higher salaries to more experienced staff has actually led to a reduction in over-all cost.

The Report expresses the view that it must be the governing authority of the hospital that decides finally what expenditure on food and kitchen staff and equipment is justified, but the preparation of financial budgets to cover catering and the efficient use of the money that is granted are matters that should primarily be the responsibility of a catering officer. The division of control so often seen in hospital catering is unlikely to lead to adequate and efficient financing of the kitchens.

A basic need is for segregation of all accounts concerning the catering. Complete records are required showing expenditure on food, salaries and wages, and overheads including depreciation, the number of meals of each type served to patients, nurses, medical and other staff. Meticulous record keeping is the foundation of sound planning and preparing budgets. This would be one of the most important duties of the catering officer. The absence of proper records leads to waste and extravagance.

Need for Radical Changes in Existing Conditions

Reorganisation it is said of the catering system in hospitals along the lines recommended by the Fund may in many instances sharply conflict with traditional practice. This fact has to be faced. Perhaps the strongest tradition that will be invoked against radical changes is that which closely associates the feeding of patients with their nursing. It is a link with the days when the sick poor were as much in need of food as of treatment, and when charity gave them both. Thus was established the close association of the nursing staff with the preparation of the patients' meals, which, in one form or another, continues.

Staffing the Kitchens

Suggestions have been made from time to time that the number of kitchen staff can be related to the number of meals served. That is not so. A hard and fast standard cannot be laid down. Hospital kitchens differ so greatly in their lay-out, their equipment, particularly the extent to which labour-saving devices have been installed, and their cooking arrangements, that each individual kitchen needs special consideration when the question of staffing is raised.

The importance of having in the key position of chef or head cook a person of skill and initiative needs no emphasis. It should be unnecessary to stress the importance of giving that person adequate remuneration and satisfactory living conditions. Indeed, the post should be one not only carrying responsibility but conferring dignity.

The head cook should be permitted to have a say in the selection of her kitchen staff. He or she should also be encouraged to take an interest in the training of the junior members of the staff. This should not be left to chance. It should be carefully planned with a view to bringing out the best in them. There is an object lesson for the hospitals in the organisation of the kitchens of our large hotels and in the manner in which they train their junior staff.

No department of the kitchen should be left to the care of an unskilled staff. Vegetables will never be prepared as they should if they are cooked in a happy-go-lucky manner by the most junior kitchen-maid or a temporary daily woman. Cooking of vegetables calls for skill if it is desired to get anything better than a sodden mess from which the greater part of the nourishment has been extracted. Sweets also require careful preparation, if variety and attractiveness are desired. The line of least resistance is to get the kitchen-maid to make a milk pudding as best she can, and it is far too frequently followed.

Buying

The principles underlying good buying are the same whether small or large hospitals or groups of hospitals are concerned. The diet will be satisfactory and the catering efficient only when the purchase of food is given full and very careful consideration.

Buying of food for hospitals or other institutions is work for an expert who has experience and knowledge not only of market and price lists, but of the quality of food and the use to which it is to be put after it is bought, both in its cooking and in its service. Where the Catering Officer is not the buyer, the buyer should be under his direction. The buyer not only buys what is required by the caterer, but he sees that it is of the right quality and kind. Buying the most suitable quality of food at the cheapest price obtainable can only be done by studying price lists, markets and trade papers, interviewing travellers, experimenting and always trying to improve. Every advantage must be taken of seasonal and other changes that so profoundly affect the markets. A competent caterer has to live on the crest of the wave.

The second Memorandum deals also with record keeping and storing, emphasising the importance of keeping full records of all food purchased and issued ; and menu planning with, ancillary to it, a number of recipes and recommendations about the planning of meals.

STAFFING THE HOSPITALS

Published jointly by the Minister of Health, the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Minister of Labour and National Service. (Published December, 1945.)

The pamphlet with the above title issued jointly by the Minister of Health, the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Minister of Labour and National Service summed up in balanced terms the need for a substantial increase in both nursing and domestic staff in hospitals and the causes of the deficiency. It also outlined measures of reform which it is hoped would stimulate recruitment.

Nursing Staff

As to the cause of the shortage of nursing staff, at that time it emphasised that there had been no diminution in the rate of recruitment and that the same was true of domestic staff. The shortage arose from increased needs due to the expansion of the hospital and health service, whilst an increase of 170,000 births per annum since 1940 meant that many more midwives were also needed. That the existing shortage itself leading to over-worked staffs and strained working conditions was a discouragement to those who might otherwise take up hospital work either as nurses or domestics is faced, as was also the fact that whilst in the better hospitals the staff had a really excellent vigorous, corporate life, the undoubted examples still existing of less modern and less enlightened methods of hospital administration were too often thought of as typical. Hence, to stimulate recruitment, besides announcing substantially increased salary scales for all grades of nurse from enrolled assistant nurse to ward sister and the establishment of national machinery for adjusting wages of domestic grades, the pamphlet laid down certain minimum conditions of service which should be aimed at by all hospitals and similar institutions.

The amelioration of conditions of work was proposed, such as shorter hours, regular off duty times and holidays ; better health supervision ; better food, etc.

A reform proposed was in the direction of greater personal freedom for nurses, insistence that nurses, in off duty hours, should have the same scope for unrestricted use of their leisure as any other member of the community.

Domestic Staff

The code for domestic staff was very similar in outline and comparatively no less liberal. For both nurses and domestics not only national negotiating machinery but also appropriate internal committees to deal with matter not appropriate to the national machinery were recommended.

The official statement prefacing the codes said : " Perhaps the most important thing to remember about the codes is that most of the prescribed conditions, and in particular those which concern hours of work and off-duty arrangements, become progressively easier to achieve as more workers come into the hospital service."

NURSING AND DOMESTIC STAFF IN HOSPITALS

(Published December, 1948.)

These notes, which cover a wide range of subjects, are intended to be read in conjunction with the statement on hospital working conditions contained in "Staffing the Hospitals," a paper issued jointly in 1945 by the Health Departments and the Ministry of Labour and National Service.

The notes are a balanced mixture of information and advice. On the subject of nurse recruitment the information includes a summary of the machinery for filling vacancies, particulars of King Edward's Fund Nursing Recruitment Service, pre-nursing courses, the position of ancillary nursing grades, the intensive courses which service nursing orderlies, with certain prescribed experience, may take on leaving the Forces, and the various channels of overseas recruitment. In the way of advice, this section deals at some length with publicity, the selection of students, part-time staff, and the more effective use of male nurses.

On the subject of "publicity," it is suggested that hospital management committees may find it advisable to appoint one of their officers who has experience of nursing problems to coordinate the various activities which the booklet suggests and to represent the needs of the hospitals to the various bodies concerned.

Management committees are urged to use part-time nursing staff of all grades as fully as possible, and to adjust hospital routine where necessary to suit the convenience of part-time workers, especially married women.

The notes express the view that hospital management committees should consider whether they might not profitably increase the number of male nurses employed. In support of this they mention such factors as the longer average period of service obtainable from men than from women, and the fact that difficulties in employing, training and accommodating mixed staffs and arranging for married men to live out "are not insuperable."

A section of the booklet dealing with training in supervision gives interesting information about a series of experiments bearing on the whole problem of staff relations. These experiments are designed to assess the value of the "Training within Industry" courses which have been tried, says the booklet, with considerable success in American and British industrial undertakings, and also with some degree of success in hospitals in the United States. These courses are not concerned with the technical aspects of nursing, but with basic principles of supervision and personal relations. They are arranged by the Ministry of Labour and National Service who, it is understood, are prepared, when their resources permit, to give management committees thorough demonstrations of the content of the courses.

The notes also deal at some length with matters affecting domestic staff.

Management committees, where they find it impossible to obtain or accommodate additional resident staff, are urged to make every effort to recruit non-resident staff, this being essential if the fullest use is to be made of the services of available married women. Other sections relating to domestic staff deal with training, selection, superannuation and staff establishment. It is satisfactory to see that under this last heading the notes mention the use of labour-saving devices.

EMPLOYMENT OF DOMESTIC STAFF IN HOSPITALS

King's Fund Recommendations

King Edward's Hospital Fund for London, 10, Old Jewry, London, E.C.2.
(Published July, 1946.)

In the course of 1945 King Edward's Hospital Fund for London received a request from the Factory and Welfare Advisory Board of the Ministry of Labour and National Service to examine matters connected with the employment of domestic staff in hospitals, with a view to making recommendations for consideration by hospitals. The Board had noted that although a considerable advance had been made in the provision of suitable accommodation and amenities for hospital domestic staff, there was still a grave shortage of labour which was aggravated by a high rate of turnover.

The Fund agreed to the request, and a committee was set up under the chairmanship of the Rt. Hon. Malcolm McCorquodale, P.C., with the following terms of reference :—

"To consider matters connected with the employment (but not the remuneration) of resident and daily domestic staff in hospitals, with a view to making recommendations on staff management and welfare supervision." The following is a summary of the committee's recommendations :—

A. General

1. Workers from Europe. The Government's plans for bringing over women from Europe for domestic work should be implemented with the least possible delay.

2. Status of Domestic Work. The Ministry of Education and the Ministry of Labour, in their advisory work with juveniles, should give due importance to domestic work as a main factor in the well-being of the community, and as offering opportunities for a skilled and satisfying career.

3. Training in Personnel Management. Three-month courses in personnel management, having special reference to hospital work, should be arranged by the Institute of Labour Management, the Ministry of Labour, or some other appropriate body.

4. Economy of Labour. One of the Government departments should organise an Exhibition of the labour-saving appliances which have been found most serviceable for hospital use, and information as to their availability be supplied to the hospitals. The exhibition might be organised in London first and might tour the provinces later.

The proposed National Institute of Houseworkers should make a scientific analysis of domestic work in hospitals, with a view to increased efficiency, economy of labour and regrading of personnel.

In all plans for hospital construction, architects should pay special attention to the need for economising in personnel and mechanising domestic work as far as possible.

5. Uniform as a Factor in Raising Status. The Board of Trade should give high priority to the relaxation of restrictions on the uniform of hospital staffs.

B. Recommendations to Hospitals

1. Workers from Europe. Hospitals should make the fullest use of the opportunities provided by the Government's recent decision to admit European women for domestic employment in hospitals. This may be either by applying for workers brought over under the Government scheme, or by getting in touch themselves with workers of any nationality other than German, and applying for permits for their admission.

2. Status of Domestic Work. Every effort to be made to raise the status of domestic work by offering well-planned training schemes and better opportunities of promotion.

3. Appointment of Domestic Supervisor and Welfare Officer. All but the smallest hospitals should appoint a full-time domestic supervisor and welfare worker, responsible for the recruitment, training, supervision and welfare of daily and resident domestic staff. The domestic supervisor should be accustomed to dealing with people and also should have the right personality for the work. She should have had training and experience in institutional management or domestic science and, if possible, some training in personnel management.

The domestic supervisor should be responsible to the Matron, except in financial matters, in which it should be her duty to advise the Board through the appropriate channels.

The post of domestic supervisor should be made equal, in status and remuneration, to comparable posts in industry in the area.

4. Economy of Labour. Greater use should be made of labour-saving equipment, as it becomes available.

As the overall shortage of labour is likely to continue indefinitely, the domestic routines in hospital should be reviewed in order to economise time and effort and to reduce to the minimum the number of man-hours needed for the essential cleaning, upkeep and service.

In plans for building, all details of construction and choice of materials should be considered from the point of view of economising in personnel and mechanising domestic work.

5. The Nursing Staff and Domestic Duties. As soon as sufficient domestic staff are available, the nursing staff should be relieved of domestic responsibilities.

Carefully planned teaching and practice in housecraft should be a recognised part of the nurses' training, but the domestic requirements of the wards should not depend on the student nurses to such an extent as to absorb much of their time or energies.

6. Type of Workers to be Recruited. Every effort should be made to offer conditions, training and opportunities of promotion which will attract a better type of worker. At the same time, hospitals cannot depend entirely on these, and domestic work in hospital affords a valuable form of employment for those with some physical or mental handicap. Each hospital should decide whether it can staff on normal workers only, or whether it should take also the handicapped. If the latter, special arrangements should be made for their supervision and training and it might be well to secure the co-operation of the other workers in taking responsibility for them.

7. Ward Orderlies. Hospitals might consider the employment of ward orderlies who should have a special schedule of duties, including some of the non-nursing services to the patients which were previously part of the nurses' routine. Ward orderlies should wear a distinctive uniform.

8. Male Domestic Orderlies. Hospitals might consider the greatly increased employment of male domestic orderlies and take immediate steps to recruit ex-service men for this.

9. Hours of Duty. The straight shift system should be introduced wherever it is practicable. Where there are not sufficient domestics for this, the objection to hospital hours can be met by arranging for more evenings off duty for resident domestic staff. This might be made possible by the employment of more part-time workers, by a reallocation of work between resident and non-resident staff, or by "help-yourself" arrangement for the evening meal for all staff.

10. Transport. Hospitals which recruit or might recruit daily workers from residential areas a short distance away, should provide a 'bus to collect them if public transport is not adequate.

Hospitals in the country should see to it that there is transport to the nearest town for their resident staff.

11. Accommodation and Amenities. Better accommodation for domestic staff should, and no doubt will, be arranged in many hospitals as soon as building is possible. In the meantime, attention should be given to any details which help to create a happy atmosphere in the home and to make the worker feel she is regarded as an individual. Where it is practicable, the domestic staff should have a floor or wing to themselves, or in larger hospitals a self-contained home with a separate entrance. The catering should be the same for the domestic staff as for the nurses. There should be a canteen or other meals service for the daily workers.

12. Health. In hospitals of suitable size a minor ailments clinic should be held daily and domestic staff encouraged to use it. On the general health care of staff, hospitals are referred to the recommendations in the Memorandum on the Supervision of Nurses' Health published by King Edward's Hospital Fund.

13. Pensions. Consideration should be given to the arrangement of non-contributory pension schemes for long-service domestics, and such schemes should be fully explained to every worker and published as part of the hospital's recruitment policy.

14. Uniform. As soon as the regulations permit, consideration should be given to the value, both for recruitment and for morale, of an attractive and practical uniform.

15. Nurseries. The larger hospitals should consider the possibility of providing nurseries where daily workers can leave their children, or arrangements should be made with a local nursery so as to fit in with the hours at which the workers are needed in hospital.

16. Recruitment through the Hospital Population. Much more recruitment work for domestic staff should be undertaken through in-patients or their visitors, or through out-patients.

17. Contact with the Ministry of Labour and National Service. In view of the active steps taken by other employers, hospital authorities should make sure that their staff requirements are constantly before the Local Employment Committees and other advisory committees of the Ministry of Labour in the region.

REPORT OF WORKING PARTY ON THE RECRUITMENT AND TRAINING OF NURSES

Published by His Majesty's Stationery Office.
Price 2s. 6d. (Published September, 1947.)

The Report of the Working Party appointed by the Minister of Health, the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Minister of Labour and National Service to enquire into the recruitment and training of nurses was published in September, 1947.

The Working Party was given very wide terms of reference. It was suggested that it should survey the whole field of recruitment and training of nurses of all types and it was given the utmost freedom to determine the lines along which, and the limits within which, it should pursue its enquiry. It was, however, laid down that the Working Party's objective should not be to attempt to formulate interim proposals to remedy or palliate present difficulties but rather to assess, if possible, what nursing force in terms of quantity and quality was likely to be required in the future, when the national health service had been developed and to suggest how best that force could be trained and deployed.

Intelligence of Nurses

From the results of its survey of intelligence the Working Party concludes :

(i) The very wide range of ability among nurses shows that the profession is far from being homogeneous in quality. No uniform and satisfactory training course can be given to candidates of the widely diverse levels of ability found among student nurses.

(ii) If training requirements are to be properly met, the selection of candidates must have regard to their ability to meet these requirements. This end can best be achieved by employing standard tests of intelligence in conjunction with other selection techniques.

(iii) Candidates for nurse training who, though suitable on personality and other grounds, are below the level of ability required to complete the course successfully, should be encouraged to accept employment in a capacity ancillary to nursing.

Intake and Loss of Trained Nurses

The main results of an analysis of the intake and loss of trained nurses are :—

(a) The number of trained nurses entering first employment in hospital each year is probably between 9,500 and 10,000.

(b) About 6,300 trained nurses each year transfer to hospitals from nursing employment in other hospitals or elsewhere.

(c) The average number of trained nurses in the hospital field leaving the profession each year is estimated to be about 5,600; another 3,000 are estimated to leave the profession from the public health and other fields.

(d) Rather more than a third of the loss from hospitals is due to marriage. Sickness accounts for about 9% of the loss from general hospitals and for 5 to 15% in other hospitals.

(e) The annual replacement rate of trained nurses must be at least about 9,000 a year before any expansion in the size of the profession can take place.

Wastage during Training

The average wastage during training in all fields at present amounts to 54%. While some part of this wastage is undoubtedly due to the admission of candidates who lack the ability or temperament to pursue the training successfully the exceptionally high rate of wastage among student nurses clearly indicates that they are expected to work and train under conditions which even many of those suitably equipped are not prepared to tolerate.

The results of a special study of the causes of the wastage indicated that there is at present a general factor underlying all causes of wastage. This factor is composite and manifests itself as the combined effect of all the various reasons which are given for leaving—hospital discipline, food, pay, etc. The reasons which enter into this composite factor are not equally important. First in significance is hospital discipline, the second the attitude of senior staff. Inadequacy of food both in quality and quantity and the span and pressure of working hours come next in that order. Following on this are poor accommodation, insufficient pay, poor social and recreational facilities and the domestic work which students have to carry out. Dissatisfaction either with training methods or examinations is apparently unimportant in its effect upon attitudes towards nurse training. Dissatisfaciton with arrangements for the care of nurses' health is in rather a different category; it does not tend to provoke discontent with other features of hospital life as do hospital discipline and the attitude of the senior staff.

From this study the conclusion clearly emerges that the most important cause of wastage is the type of discipline which pervades the training schools. Self abnegation has been the keynote of a code of discipline originally inspired by a conventional tradition and, although thus historically intelligible, the tradition has, through the insularity of institutional life, been preserved more or less unaltered by the profound changes in social life which have affected the community as a whole. During the inter-war years a generation has grown up nurtured on modern ideas of personal freedom and the relationship between the sexes, and inevitably a gulf has separated representatives of the old order from the newcomers to nursing. Potential student nurses to-day for the most part regard nursing as a profession with no more justification than any other for encroaching upon their personal life. It is not surprising, therefore, that friction should occur between the older and younger generations of nurses, and feelings are exacerbated by the psychological deprivations which the older generation had perforce to suffer and from which the emancipated younger generation of nurses is free.

Experience has shown that it is of little use merely appealing to hospital authorities to modify discipline or to adopt more understanding attitudes and, therefore, the introduction of structural changes in the organisation and staffing of training schools is needed.

As a result of its investigations into wastage of student nurses the Working Party concludes that the following changes must be introduced :

(i) Nurses in training must no longer be regarded as junior employees subject to an outworn system of discipline. They must be accorded full student status with the conditions such status implies, so far as the intrinsic requirements of nurse training permit.

(ii) A new selection procedure for student nurses (see later).

(iii) A method of selection for appointment to senior posts which will help to secure that only those are appointed who possess the capacity for developing satisfactory human relationships.

(iv) Steps must be taken to improve the quantity and quality of diet and to provide suitable accommodation and other amenities.

(v) The training day must be reduced in span so that it approximates as closely as is practicable to that of a " normal " working day. This involves the introduction of a three-shift system.

The Training of Nurses—New Scheme

Student nurses should be treated as students for a period of two years, the first eighteen months of which would be devoted to common content for all students and the remaining six months to concentrated study in a chosen field. (This is based on a five-day training week of 40 hours and six weeks' annual vacation.) At the end of the two years and subject to examinations the nurse would be granted provisional state registration and would be entitled to the pay, status and title of state registered nurse but would be required to spend a third year in nursing practice under supervision before provisional registration would be confirmed, after which the nurse would be licensed to engage in private practice or be employed otherwise than under supervision. There would be one common register for all nurses.

During her 18 months basic training the student nurse would cover a much wider field than she does at present, particularly on the preventive side. From the start of her training the student would be made aware of all fields of nursing and what the community does to promote health.

The state examination would be divided into two parts, the first taking place at the end of 18 months and the second at the end of two years, the latter being more closely related to the specific content of the chosen course. The verdict of examination should be checked against evidence of subsequent proficiency.

With regard to midwifery qualification, it is suggested that the present training requirements of the College of Midwives could be integrated in the scheme outlined, thus leading towards unification of the nursing profession.

Some Implications of the New Scheme of Training

Basic Conditions : Conditions must be such as to permit the planning and conduct of training courses unhampered by the staffing requirements of particular hospitals : this calls for adequate and stable domestic and nursing staff in the hospitals concerned.

The dissociation of training from staffing needs will place the student under the control of the training authority and not of the hospital, and the cost of training should be dealt with entirely separately from the general maintenance expenditure of the hospitals concerned; student nurses would not be employees of the hospital. It will be the concern of the Minister of Health to watch the demand for and stimulate the supply of nurses. The notion of " recruitment " will no longer apply though the Ministry of Labour and National Service will continue to be concerned with the initial selection of a career.

A three-shift system will be necessary, for qualified staff no less than students, in order to achieve a " normal " working day.

Teaching Needs : It is essential that measures be taken to safeguard the sufficiency and quality of the teaching staff who should be skilled in handling people and in the use of the most modern educational methods and technical devices for instruction.

Remuneration : Since in the future student nurses are to be treated as students and, instead of training being incidental to their work in the wards, the service they render to the hospital becomes incidental to their training, the basis of their remuneration calls for re-consideration. It is necessary that a training grant be made to a student nurse adequate to cover reasonable personal expenses (including on vacation) in addition to board residence or an allowance in lieu, and free tuition, the grant being paid by the training authority. Nevertheless, it is of considerable importance to stress the view that what is required is not so much slight changes in the size of grants paid during the relatively brief training period but better training and wider career prospects with enhanced status and opportunities.

Probably one-third or even half of the wastage of nurses during training could be prevented by selection methods, which would exclude those unfitted for nurse training at the outset. Perhaps a quarter of the student intake in recent years was unsuitable for nurse training ; about half of these would appear to be temperamenttally and half intellectually unfit for nurse training.

It is, therefore, necessary to assess in advance the candidate's capacity to respond to training and, having studied reports of experience in other comparable fields, a simple and straightforward procedure is recommended which should be used only by specially trained persons. This approach would involve a careful interview by the personnel selection officer during which particulars are elicited concerning general education and occupational background as well as of interests, stability and personality; a questionnaire dealing with occupational preference, "self-knowledge" and health; and standardised tests of intelligence.

Recruitment: It appears that the recruitment of candidates for nursing is a secondary task; the primary task is to remove the deterrents to recruitment which are much the same as the causes of training wastage.

Organisation and Administration

Nurse Training Units: Both hospitals and public health agencies should form a composite training unit of which there should be at least one in every hospital region. Existing schools may serve as key institutions, but none will be complete in itself. The organisation of the training in each unit would be the responsibility of a director or principal assisted by an adequate staff, some full time and others (staffs of hospitals and public health agencies) part time.

Regional Organisation: Circumstances will dictate the number and size of training units in each region, but there should be two subdivisions of nursing administration; one to organise the nursing services of the community (i.e. the function of the regional hospital board, hospital management committees, boards of governors of teaching hospitals and local health authorities), and the other the recruitment and training. Each unit would have its education committee comprising representatives of the teaching staff, hospital matrons and governing bodies of the institutions comprising the unit.

A regional nursing training board with wide representation would need to be established to co-ordinate the work of the units in the region. The principal duties of such board would include:—

(i) planning and co-ordination of facilities for training;

(ii) co-ordination of standards of admission and allocation of students;

(iii) approval of supervisors;

(iv) formation of advisory centres.

Central Organisation: It is presumed that standing advisory committees for nursing will be set up by the Minister concerned, in addition to the Central and Scottish Health Services Councils, to advise on the general administration of the nursing services and organisation at the national level of the system of training. The existing Ministry of Health Division of Nursing and that of the Department of Health for Scotland will need to be strengthened so as to carry out efficiently inspection and supervision of the system of training. An adviser on nursing education would be required on the staff of the chief nursing officer.

Headquarters Research Units: Headquarters research units should be set up at the Ministry of Health and the Department of Health for Scotland to initiate and co-ordinate research work on technical matters affecting the work and life of the nursing profession including recruitment and training.

Experimental Centres: "Laboratories" for the headquarters research staff would be experimental training centres, which would act as observation centres and sources of new methods, this all determined by the criterion that training should contribute to reduce the incidence or duration of sickness.

General Nursing Council: It is assumed that the General Nursing Councils will continue to be responsible for examination, registration and discipline, the syllabus being subject to the approval of the Health Department.

The constitution, however, should be amended to arrange for regional representation on the Council itself (instead of nationally elected representatives), and the two existing Councils (for England and Wales and for Scotland) should be amalgamated to form a General Nursing Council for Great Britain upon which should be represented government departments, nurses and university or other educational agencies.

If training of midwives is incorporated in nurse training the General Nursing Councils and the Central Midwives Board should be combined to form one governing body to cover all fields of nursing and midwifery in England, Wales and Scotland. This body should include representatives of government departments, nurses, midwives, university and other educational agencies, and might be called the General Council for Nurses and Midwives of Great Britain.

Effects of Proposals

Effects of three shift system: Having taken a varied sample of hospitals and made necessary adjustments to achieve uniformity, it appeared that the general hospitals in the sample require about 30 trained nurses per 100 beds to operate a three-shift system. This represented an increase of about 50% for voluntary general hospitals and 85% for municipal. It is only possible to make the most tentative estimate of the number of additional trained nurses required to operate the three-shift working day throughout the country, but the maximum number is not likely to be less than 12,000 and may exceed that figure. An addition of 8,000 (not all trained nurses) would be required to staffs of mental hospitals, sanatoria and public health institutions.

Effects of introducing student status: The number of additional nurses required to make possible the introduction of student status in training schools is estimated at between 14,000 and 15,000 trained nurses and 5,000 nursing orderlies. To maintain the numerical strength of the nursing profession at its December, 1945, figure requires an annual intake of newly qualified nurses of some 9,000. If the annual intake were maintained at 20,000 suitable recruits, the number of trained nurses entering the profession each year might rise to 15,000, that is, a margin over replacement of not less than 5,000. If all these could be devoted to providing the staff necessary to secure the three-shift day and student status the additional force required of, say, 24,000 trained nurses could be built up in five years, and probably 14,000 students would provide sufficient nurses to meet the increased replacement rate of 12,000 a year.

All this demands the removal of all restrictions on the employment of married persons, the development of part-time service and the extension of the use of male nurses.

It is estimated that the trained nursing force at December, 1945, was 88,000, and that the minimum required to meet the proposals made is 112,000. Given the immediate shortage of 9/10,000, the requirements call for a trained nursing force of 120/125,000, and this is not having regard to the (largely unknown) additional requirements of the National Health Service.

WORKING PARTY ON THE RECRUITMENT AND TRAINING OF NURSES

Minority Report

Published by His Majesty's Stationery Office
Price 1s. 6d. (Published September, 1948)

The Minority Report was prepared because there was a divergence of view between Dr. Cohen and the other members of the Working Party on the nature of the basic problems in the nursing situation.

A completely new departure in method is proposed on scientific lines since it would probably be true to say that in the face of a seemingly intractable nursing situation the old methods of compiling reports on nursing can do little more than solve an occasional problem by dint of persistent trial and error in discussion. All bias, however subtle in the new approach to the problem, must be avoided, and it is urged that scientific method where applicable must be followed wherever it leads, the unpalatability of relevant facts not being allowed to prevent their coming to light. In order to be effective, an enquiry into hospital nursing services must examine the organisation of a hospital as a whole, for the nurse's role cannot, without loss of perspective, be abstracted from the context of the institution in which she works. The type of enquiry now proposed is, in effect, operational research in the field of health, the object of which would be to ascertain the conditions in which each component—staffs, buildings, equipment, siting, size and functions—may contribute to the optimum working of the total scheme.

The Community's Nursing Needs

Unless an answer can be given to the fundamental question " what is the correct number of nurses ? " little progress can be made in planning a nursing service. A distinction must be made between this basic task of finding an answer to certain key questions and the need to effect certain changes, e.g. humanising hospital discipline, the justification for which is not doubted by those familiar with the facts. In the first case, a fairly considerable research effort may be needed ; in the second, the situation demands an effort of will to bring about the necessary change. Attention is now to be concentrated on the former problem. Examples are given of past failures to estimate the nursing and other professional requirements of the community.

In discussions with the late Mr. Geoffrey Pyke it became evident to Dr. Cohen that any calculations of nursing needs must be closely linked up with the question of the correct allocation of woman power in the interests of the community as a whole, not merely in a localised area. Health planning within the master plan for the national economy must seek to use the national resources allocated to it in the best interests of the nation as a whole. Factors which have to be taken into consideration when making any estimate of nursing needs include an estimate of the number of beds required, and the correct size of the curative services, this linking up with proposals regarding the preventive services.

How Many Beds ?

Probably the most important single factor in attempting to determine the size of the nursing service is an estimate of the number of beds required, but unfortunately, when approached, various authorities throughout the country have made widely different recommendations. Certainly there are many practical difficulties to be encountered when attempting such an estimate, but proposals put forward rarely offer any sound basis on which to build. In 1945-46, for instance, a series of hospital surveys throughout England and Wales was undertaken by the Nuffield Provincial Hospitals Trust. The recommended bed ratios for a provision of all types of bed per 1,000 of the population ranged from 6.6 to 10.1, an impossibly wide range to be of use in building up a hospital service. Whatever ratio of nursing or medical staff to beds was adopted, the upper limit would, on these recommendations, exceed the lower by nearly 50 per cent.

Opinion versus Research

Reforms in the past have been advanced on social or moral grounds rather than on the strength of scientific or economic evidence, but, as Sir Oliver Franks has recently stated, planning in the health, as in other fields involves " decisions of policy quantitatively expressed in the form of programmes and such measures as in particular circumstances may be necessary to ensure the performance of these programmes."

No solution to the really basic problems of nursing reconstruction may be expected without a radical change in the current attitude towards research in the social sciences. Two types of research organisation are proposed—one to study the common and many-sided problems which affect not only nursing, but other aspects of the industrial and social life of the community, such as the optimal distribution of woman power and methods of increasing productivity in health and other fields ; the other to be located in the Health Departments and to be concerned with problems specific to the health field. This latter would act as a sociological research base for health planning with a section allotted specifically to nursing problems.

Criterion of Nursing Productivity

Before it is possible to determine the correct allocation of woman power for nursing, the effectiveness or output of nurses must be assessed in order to measure the effect on production of increasing or decreasing the size of the nursing profession. The aim is to ascertain the number of nurses to train and employ in the interests of the community as a whole as contrasted both with the smallest number with which the health service can operate without breaking down and with the largest number that could be attracted to the profession. The problem is one of measuring efficiency by evaluating on some acceptable criterion the performance of nursing duties and the criterion suggested is the patient's duration of stay, this being held to be an index of the duration of his sickness and the only objective measure of the success of nurses and doctors in speeding his recovery. This has, however, never been explicitly nor probably even implicitly the aim of hospitals in the past which have been more concerned to play a custodial role, not always with the most desirable psychological effects on the patient.

Detailed Examination of Hypothesis

The hypothesis to be examined may be formulated thus : in hospitals of the same type, where provision is made for the same sickness groups in similar proportions and where the quality of the nursing or medical staff is roughly the same, the average duration of stay depends on the number of patients per nurse and per doctor. It is assumed that the quality of hospital facilities and equipment in so far as it has an effect on the patient's stay varies with the number of doctors and therefore is taken into account.

In the general training hospital (voluntary) it was discovered that there was definitely an inverse relationship between the nurse bed ratio and the duration of stay, that the productivity secured by the saving in the patients' working days would just about offset the increase in salaries due to an increased number of trained nurses, and that the presence or absence of student nurses had no noticeable effect on the patient's duration of stay.

In general non-training hospitals (voluntary), the majority being cottage hospitals, the trained nurse has to be skilled and resourceful since there are generally no full time resident medical staff. To reduce patient stay from 17.6 to 16.6 days, an additional 1,000 trained nurses would be necessary, or alternatively, probably three times as many assistant nurses or 3,400 additional part-time doctors would meet the need.

The data suggests that in mental hospitals, nursing assistants are performing a useful function in accelerating patients' recovery, a function apparently carried out more effectively by them than by trained mental nurses under present systems of training.

The evidence indicates that in tuberculosis sanatoria, the particular quantity and quality of nursing care has comparatively little effect on the patient's rate of recovery, rest and good food being the essential features here. This emphasises the importance of the preventive services in this field since the curative processes cannot readily be speeded up.

The nursing staff needs of the chronic sick might be met by engaging additional nursing orderlies to assist the trained nurse, but this is propounded only as a temporary expedient pending further factual enquiries into the true nursing needs of the chronic sick.

Salaries

The economic value of a nurse's work depends on the value of the work of those she helps to regain their health. The immediate and direct productivity of a nurse (calculated to be £200 p.a. value in a general training hospital, £230 p.a. in a general non-training hospital) is considerably less than that of the average worker, but it does not necessarily follow that she should be paid less. Her indirect contribution to the physical productivity of the community should be noted—care for the housewives and the children, and of the old and infirm.

Recruitment and Selection

Nurse recruitment policy should be set against a background of the distribution of national man and woman power, and within the limits so determined, an even flow of suitable candidates to all the different training centres should be encouraged. It is thought that though intellectual ability is desirable in nursing candidates, more important still is a kind and cheerful disposition combined with a deep interest in the work. A psychological procedure of selection is advocated because it is economical in time, money and effort by reducing the chances of accepting candidates likely to be failures but whatever method of selection is fixed upon, it should be conducted by personnel selection officers. To test the selection procedure an experiment should be undertaken to compare the average stay of a group of patients in the charge of nurses who had been selected for training with the stay of patients in the care of nurses not so selected ; modification in the selection procedure should then be initiated based on these results. The full value of a selection procedure will not become evident until the correct lines of training have been laid down and the necessary humanitarian reforms introduced into the life and work of hospital nurses.

Period of Training

Evidence from job analysis indicates that the present three year course of nurse training could succeed equally well in two years provided domestic duties and undue repetitive work were eliminated. It does not follow, however, that a two year course would be the ideal course. If a two year course is adopted it should be regarded as a provisional measure pending further enquiry.

Content of Training

This can only be determined by referring again to the function of a nurse—to reduce the incidence and duration of disease. New analyses of nursing duties in hospitals need to be carried out in terms of patient needs as implied by the criterion of lengths of stay. The methods and content of training whether general or special should further be evaluated in the light of the effectiveness of the trained nurse. Allied with the question of training is the problem of assessing proficiency. All nursing examinations should be devised bearing in mind the end that nurse training is directed towards supplying the needs of the health service. Accordingly it is suggested that the Divisions of Nursing should be both the training and examining authority. The question of the future of the General Nursing Councils needs further consideration by a specially appointed body.

Working Conditions

Widespread inquiries have led to the conclusion that the disciplinary system is probably the chief cause of student wastage. Reference is made to the stiff and formal atmosphere, the "caste" system, the objections raised to married women, the difficulty of maintaining outside contacts and interests, the failure to secure a food supply adequate in quantity and quality, and it is once more urged that these complaints should be rectified and a generally more humane and co-operative spirit replace the stern hierarchical and segregated atmosphere of many training hospitals.

REPORT OF THE WORKING PARTY ON MIDWIVES

Published by His Majesty's Stationery Office.
Price 2s. 9d. (Published January, 1949.)

Among outstanding points made in the report, and the working party's conclusions, are the following:

Conditions of Work and Future Requirements

Evidence shows that many midwives, particularly in the domiciliary service, are at present greatly overworked. During the next few years the aim should be to reach a lower case load for district midwives, to relieve as far as possible the pressure of work on midwives working in hospitals, and to extend the amount of hospital accommodation available. The district midwife working in an urban area should by 1953 have an average case load of 55 instead of 66.4 as in 1944. A decline in the number of births would assist in securing this reduction in the case load, but against this factor has to be set four factors exerting opposing influences:—(i) the age trend among midwives, which will mean more deaths and retirements in the future; (ii) the decrease in the number of women from whom recruits may be drawn; (iii) the wider and more varied demand for the services of young women; (iv) a higher marriage rate and generally lower age of marriage among women. A decline in the number of births will, therefore, not solve to any marked degree the problem of shortages in the midwifery profession. In order to achieve the aims of lower case loads, less overwork and better quality of care both in the homes and in the hospital, the number of practising midwives must be increased by recruitment from hitherto untapped sources.

It is estimated that to secure the requisite desirable minimum of practising midwives the figure of midwives qualifying annually must be raised to about 2,100 as compared with the 1944-47 average of 1,790.

Shortage of midwives is due, inter alia, to nurses taking the midwifery qualifications without intending to practise; to the unsatisfactory nature of the present course of training; to the high rate of examination failure; and to lack of promotion prospects.

The Midwife's Place in the Health Team

The midwife should be the practitioner of normal midwifery, the expert in normal childbearing in all its varied aspects. The doctor is her partner in the detection and treatment of abnormalities, the health visitor in public health and health education and in the rearing of the child whose immediate post-natal existence the midwife has seen firmly established.

The midwife is no mere "delivery woman" whose prime function is the skilful delivery of a live child. While that is the climax of her task, it started months before, early in pregnancy, and should, in the Working Party's view, continue for at least a month after delivery. This implies that the midwife will remain in attendance, visiting perhaps two or three times weekly during the difficult period when the newly delivered mother is finding her feet, getting about again, and coping with a small baby.

If the foregoing is to be the function of the midwife, she must be a professional woman of standing and her level of education and qualities of character must be high, and if the midwifery profession is to attract and hold the type of woman it requires, the midwife must be given such training and conditions of service as will enable her to become and remain a professional woman, as are the doctor, the teacher and the civil servant.

It is important that those actually working the National Health Service should have an opportunity of taking some part in shaping it, and it is therefore recommended that in each hospital region a Maternity Services Committee should be set up, to include obstetricians, general practitioners and midwives.

In a postscript to its Report the Working Party states that its attention has been "drawn to many complaints both from Medical Officers of Health and midwives that general practitioners giving maternity service under Part IV of the National Health Service Act are tending to take over the whole of ante-natal care as well as relegating midwives to the status of maternity nurses. In some cases midwives are not seeing patients until they go to deliver them. Furthermore, pupils are getting no opportunity to see ante-natal care.

"This is entirely contrary to the development of the maternity services as outlined to us by representatives of the Health Department and as envisaged by us. . . . We recognise that it is right that a general practitioner should accept his full responsibility for his patient but not that he should exclude his partner, the midwife, whose function is, we should have thought, well established and clearly recognised. Moreover, as already stated . . . we are convinced that it is not possible for the present number of doctors to take over complete responsibility for all maternity work in addition to their other commitments, even if this were desirable. As we have said, however, we do not consider it in the patient's interest for either party to monopolise the case. They should work as a team.

" We hope that prompt administrative action will be taken to stop this new and unwelcome trend which could wreck the structure of the midwifery services."

Training

There should be a common basic training for nurses and midwives, followed—in the case of midwives—by a year's specialist training with a revised and improved curriculum. Basic training should include at least a four weeks' period in obstetrics. Except for certain special posts, there is no need for a midwife to be a State Registered Nurse, but until the new trainng can be adopted only State Registered Nurses should be trained as midwives. Existing holders of the S.C.M. qualification without a nursing qualification should be eligible for all midwifery appointments. Separate Schools of Midwifery, with finance and administration separate from the hospital system, should be set up. Pupil midwives should have student status and there should be obligatory refresher courses for all practising midwives.

Analgesia

The Working Party consider that the limited means of analgesia at the midwife's disposal place her at a distinct disadvantage in the face of the growing public demand for relatively painless childbirth and they urge that the Medical Research Council should be asked to set up a committee to find a more effective method of analgesia for use by midwives. " Without the addition of this weapon in her armamentarium, the midwife cannot play her proper part in the health team. Furthermore, until this problem is solved the swing away from domiciliary confinement will continue."

Pay, Promotion and Living Conditions

It is clear that midwives, both in domiciliary and institutional work are acutely dissatisfied with their pay, and in any general scaling up of medico-social salaries the midwife must share. Present living-out allowances can only be described as deterrents to living out, and if, as the Working Party think, it is desirable for some midwives to live out, the allowances will have to be more realistic.

Promotion prospects should be increased by ensuring that in institutions senior midwifery appointments are not absorbed by nursing personnel.

All maternity units of 50 or more beds should be in the charge of an independent matron; units of 30 to 49 beds, a superintendent midwife with rank of assistant matron; units of less than 30 beds, a departmental midwifery sister. The creation of a new rank of senior sister is recommended for those unwilling to give up contact with patients for advancement on the administrative side. Every local health authority should appoint as non-medical supervisor of midwives a certified midwife.

A survey should be made of the distribution of midwives, and inducement payments made to attract them to under-staffed areas. The number of cases a midwife should deal with should be reduced by 1953 to 55 a year in urban areas. Below the rank of maternity ward sister, the " straight duty " system should be instituted for institutional midwives, while for domiciliary midwives off-duty times and adequate reliefs should be ensured by local grouping. Every domiciliary midwife ought to be provided with a car and given sufficient financial help to run it. Houses should be provided for established midwives and hostels for junior and pupil midwives. The holiday entitlement of midwives should be raised to five weeks a year, or alternatively they should be given a day in lieu of Bank Holidays.

Recruitment

In order to secure the necessary increase in recruitment to 2,100 newly qualified midwives each year by 1953, it will be necessary to look to schools other than only the secondary grammar school for recruitment. More guidance should be given to school leavers on the scope of midwifery as a career. Special steps must be taken to recruit older women from the 30-45 age group. In particular, consideration must be given to the use of special teaching methods adapted to the needs of such older women, and it may be desirable to set aside certain schools for them. A short course on inferior qualification is not, however, recommended. Not nearly enough use is at present being made of part-time workers, and they must be encouraged and suitable steps taken to secure their employment.

Administration

The proposal of the Nurses' Working Party that the General Nursing Councils for England and Wales and for Scotland should be amalgamated with the respective Central Midwives' Boards to form a single General Council for Nurses and Midwives of Great Britain is rejected. In the view of the Midwives' Working Party, the argument that the unity of the nursing and maternity professions is a desirable object cannot be accepted. While both may base their training on a common foundation, subsequent divergence is considerable in function, methods and principles. A single statutory body could not satisfactorily control both.

It is not considered either that there should be a fusion of the English and Scottish Central Midwives' Boards. With separate legislation, such unification is not thought desirable, and the economies likely to result would be negligible. The Working Party, however, recommends definite liaison arrangements between the two Central Midwives' Boards, and closer co-operation between the Boards and the General Nursing Councils by means of an informal Consultative Committee.

The Midwives' Working Party also disagrees with the Nurses' Working Party on the latter's proposal that an Advisor on Nursing Education should be appointed to the staff of the Chief Nursing Officer of the Ministry of Health and the Department of Health for Scotland. The ground for this disagreement is the belief that professional education and standards are not the province of Government Departments, but of the professions themselves.

REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON HOSPITAL ACCOUNTS

Published by the Institute of Hospital Administrators, 75, Portland Place, London, W.1. Price 8s. 6d. (Published June, 1948.)

The Joint Committee on Hospital Accounts comprising members of the Institute of Hospital Administrators, the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and the Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, was set up in July, 1946, with the following terms of reference :

" To formulate proposals for a set of accounts that would be applicable to all classes of hospitals under the National Health Service Bill[1] and in doing so to give serious consideration to the need for close co-relation between any method of preparing accounts and the provision of general statistical data."

The report of the Committee was published in June, 1948.

The Committee made the following general recommendations :

The Committee has considered various methods for the preparation of hospital accounts and recommends that the most suitable is a General Income and Expenditure Account based upon simplified departmental or service costs, leading to a Balance Sheet showing at the end of each financial year a detailed statement of the assets and liabilities of the hospital.

A new principle in hospital accounts, which will be introduced as a result of the application of the National Health Service Act, 1946, is the linking of expenditure with the Budget of the Ministry of Health and of the National Exchequer.

The necessity of estimating expenditure for periods of a year (such estimates having to be made approximately six months before the beginning of the year in question) has been borne in mind when making the recommendations contained in this report, and the methods suggested are those which it is considered will give most easily, accurate figures and the maximum information necessary for the financial control of the service.

The form of presenting accounts together with supporting statistical tables in general use at the present time, showing " average cost of each in-patient per week " and " cost per out-patient attendance," is, in the Committee's view, lacking in detail, as it attempts to reduce all hospital maintenance expenditure to two units of cost, namely, cost per bed and cost per out-patient attendance, and does not give sufficient information to enable satisfactory comparisons to be made between costs of comparable institutions.

Examination of statistical tables prepared by representative hospitals disclosed that the variance in costs is generally accounted for by such factors as (a) differing or additional ancillary and auxiliary services, (b) the arbitrary basis of allocating expenditure between in-patients and out-patients, (c) the difference in age and construction of buildings, e.g. pavilion or vertical unit, and (d) varied local conditions.

The General Income and Expenditure Account now recommended by the Committee obviates the differences caused by (a) and (b) in the above paragraph by disclosing the cost of each ancillary and auxiliary service, and by avoiding as far as possible the question of arbitrary apportionments. Where the nature of the expenditure is such that it can only be allocated to all departments on an arbitrary basis, it is shown as a separate service, e.g., Heating, Lighting and Water, and Laundry.

For the purpose of making detailed comparisons of costs of comparable departments (either contained within an institution or in several institutions) it is recommended that suitable units of costs be adopted. For example :—

Wards	Per In-Patient Day
Theatres	Per Operation
Diagnostic X-Rays	Per Attendance
Laboratory Services	Per Specimen

The Committee has divided the expenditure side of the General Income and Expenditure Account into three sections :—

(a) Direct Services :
  Departments that are in direct contact with patients and which at the same time are common to most hospitals, i.e., the basic services.

(b) Indirect Services :
  Departments that are not directly concerned with patients, but none the less are integral hospital services. (Provision has been made under this heading to meet the requirements of the large hospitals, although it is realised that some of the headings, e.g. Works Superintendent's Office, Training Schools, will not apply to every hospital.)

(c) Ancillary and Auxiliary Services :
  Special departments or services that are not common to all hospitals.

Certain departments to be found in the large hospitals, and sometimes regarded as separate units, e.g. bakery, have not been shown as separate services in the General Income and Expenditure Account. The costs of these departments should be allocated to the other departments (including outside institutions for whom work might be performed) according to services rendered, as such expenditure is common to all hospitals, and hospitals without these internal services must purchase and allocate to the various departments at the " all in " contractor's price.

The Committee, aware of the difficulties experienced by small hospitals in the matters of accountancy, recommends that where the maintaining of records necessary to complete a fully detailed account would entail administrative difficulties, the condensed form of General Income and Expenditure Account could be used with the consent of the Ministry of Health. This, although giving essential information, amalgamates under each sub-heading like activities whilst at the same time disclosing the cost of expensive services.

[1] Now "National Health Service Act 1946."

The Committee has grouped income under six main sections, as shown in the General Income and Expenditure Account, and in making this recommendation has interpreted Section 52(2) of the National Health Service Act, 1946, as meaning that the net revenue from any special activity shall be paid into the Exchequer ; but if it is the intention of the Minister of Health that the cost of running the department or activity is to be included in the hospital's budget of expenditure and the gross revenue paid over to the Exchequer, then the gross revenue should be given in the General Income and Expenditure Account and the departmental expenditure shown under Auxiliary and Ancillary Services on the opposite side. Income and expenditure in connection with projects of an exceptional nature, the subject of separate grants by the Ministry of Health, e.g., constructional work, special research, etc., or financed by trusts, legacies or donations for special hospital purposes or research should be accounted for separately and not brought into the General Income and Expenditure Account.

In addition to the above, a separate Income and Expenditure Account should be maintained for moneys received from the Hospital Endowments Fund, via the Minister of Health or the regional hospital board, or received direct from investments standing in the names of the board of governors or the hospital management committee. Donations given to the hospital, other than those given for special purposes, or specifically for the maintenance of the hospital, would also be dealt with in this account.

In making its recommendations the Committee has assumed that, with the possible exception of small units attached for administrative purposes to larger hospitals, each hospital will be responsible for maintaining its own financial records.

The General Recommendations are followed by detailed notes on the income and expenditure account, the balance sheet, the income and expenditure account of special funds, the supplementary accounts and the working statements, all of which are fully illustrated by specimen forms and figures. A further section of the Report deals with financial records and accounts, salaries and wages and staff records, statistical returns, and stores accounting.

EMPLOYMENT RELATIONS IN A GROUP OF HOSPITALS

A Report of a Survey by the Department of Social Science of the University of Liverpool; Joan Woodward, M.A. Published by the Institute of Hospital Administrators, 75, Portland Place, London, W.1. Price 5s. (Published June, 1950.)

The report sets out the results of an investigation into employment relations in one of the groups of hospitals formed as a result of the reorganisation of the hospital service under the National Health Service Act. The survey was undertaken by the Social Science Department of the University of Liverpool at the request of the management committee of the Central Wirral Group of Hospitals, who wished to obtain a picture of the state of morale among their employees as a guide to them in personnel matters, but most of the problems examined are common to the majority of hospitals. The terms of reference were to examine the possibilities of developing a sound personnel policy, with particular regard to :

(1) Adequate and objective methods of selection and placing of staff in work suitable to their ability.

(2) Methods of training of staff to provide for internal promotions and promotion procedure generally.

(3) Provision of good physical working conditions and suitable amenities.

(4) Practical steps to avoid excessive hours of work, consistent with the adequate maintenance of the hospital service.

(5) Right of access of staff to appropriate senior officers.

(6) Disciplinary policy.

(7) Use of joint consultation and other suitable methods to keep the staff informed on matters affecting their interests and to enable them to contribute to effective running of the service.

The survey was carried out principally by means of interviewing one in four of the whole hospital staff, nurses, domestic and ancillary workers. The principal recommendations, made with specific reference to the Central Wirral Group of Hospitals but having a wider relevance, were as follows :

Methods of selection of hospital staff should be based on a complete analysis of the work that the various grades are expected to perform. Responsibility for the preliminary selection of staff and for the administrative details of recruitment should be centralised.

Staff of all grades need a short period of induction to introduce them to the hospital. The promotion policy of the hospital should be clearly defined and should be understood by all the staff employed. Opportunities for promotion should be increased, if possible by the breaking down of more of the rigid barriers between occupational groups.

There should be a written code of procedure by which staff may lodge appeals, complaints or suggestions. The disciplinary policy of the management must be understood and accepted by the staff and there must be safeguards, in the form of a definite procedure through which breaches of discipline can be dealt with, so that the staff feel assured that penalties will not be applied arbitrarily.

The problem of achieving adequate participation of the staff in the management of the hospitals is the most serious difficulty of personnel management. Before the introduction of a joint consultative committee, it is essential for all grades of staff to agree on its purpose and constitution. The management must also decide at the outset how far the committee will be expected to participate in promulgating policy decisions, or in making them.

The Institute of Hospital Administrators

THE Institute was founded in 1902 and incorporated in 1910 as the Incorporated Association of Hospital Officers. Until 1942 its membership was primarily confined to voluntary hospital officers but upon fusion in 1942 with the Incorporated Association of Clerks and Stewards of Mental Hospitals, which had been founded in 1904 and incorporated in 1932, membership was widened to embrace officers from all sections of the hospital service. At the same time the name of the association was changed to the Incorporated Association of Hospital Administrators. In 1945 the present title was adopted.

OBJECTS

The objects of the Institute are, inter alia, to promote the general welfare of those engaged in hospital administration ; to provide for training and instruction in hospital administration, to conduct examinations and to grant certificates and diplomas to those professionally qualified, and to keep a register of such persons and generally to improve the professional standards of hospital administrators ; to publish papers on hospital administration, including a journal connected with the objects of the Institute, and to provide facilities for the reading of papers, the delivery of lectures, and the collection and dissemination of professional information ; to co-operate with hospitals and associations and bodies having objects similar to those of the Institute, and to make such representations as may be thought fit in matters affecting hospitals or hospital administrators ; to establish and support, or aid in the establishment and support of any charitable or benevolent associations or institutions in any way connected with the purposes of the Institute or calculated to further its objects.

CONSTITUTION AND ACTIVITIES

Council

The Institute's affairs are managed by a Council consisting of the President and Honorary Treasurer as ex officio members, twelve ordinary members, of whom one-third retire annually and are directly elected by the general body of members, one representative elected annually from each Region of the Institute in England and Wales and two representatives elected annually from the Scottish Division. All members of the Council must be Fellows or Associates.

Regions and Branches

For the purpose of furthering the objects of the Institute and facilitating the discussion of Institute business and professional matters generally, the Institute has fourteen regions in England and Wales, co-terminous with the areas for which Regional Hospital Boards are constituted under the National Health Service Act, 1946, and a Scottish Division, covering the whole of Scotland.

All members of the Institute in Great Britain are entitled to be members of the Region or Division in which the hospital(s) at, or for the purposes of, which they are employed is situated. Each Region has a Regional Council consisting of the regional representative to the Institute Council as an ex officio member, one member nominated by the Institute Council, and twelve other members (Fellows or Associates) elected annually from among and by the members of the Region. Similarly in Scotland there is a Scottish Divisional Council. Within certain regions, where geographical and other considerations have rendered it necessary, the Region has been sub-divided into two or more Branches, each of which has its own Branch Committee and officers.

In addition to members, registered students who have been granted certain privileges of membership (see " Registered Students—Privileges of Membership " below) are also attached to Regions and Branches in the same way as members.

Activities

To carry out the objects mentioned above, the Institute, inter alia :—

(i) holds conferences and other meetings from time to time in London and elsewhere at which papers on various aspects of hospital administration are read, and opportunities given for discussion and exchange of views on questions affecting hospital administration and those in the profession. In particular an annual conference is arranged which is usually held alternatively in London and the provinces in April or May. Likewise for the same purpose conferences, refresher courses and other meetings are regularly arranged by the Institute Regions and Branches.

(ii) through its Council considers all matters affecting hospital administrators, their responsibilities, duties, status and conditions of service, making representations when necessary and desirable. The Institute is a constituent member of the Health Services Administrative and Clerical Staffs Whitley Council, on which it has three seats, and at the present time the Secretary of the Institute is Staff Side and Joint Secretary of the Council and also Staff Side and Joint Secretary of the Health Services General Whitley Council.

(iii) through its Education Committee maintains a Register of Students and holds examinations in hospital administration, successful candidates on completing a prescribed period of approved hospital administrative service being eligible for election as Associate members.

(iv) holds an annual summer school in hospital administration and from time to time arranges week-end and other courses.

(v) from time to time publishes reports on various aspects of hospital administration, and in particular publishes the monthly journal The Hospital, and also The Hospita Year Book and The Hospital Diary.

(vi) co-operates with government departments and other bodies and organisations on matters affecting hospital administration.

MEMBERSHIP

The Institute has three classes of membership: Fellowship, Associateship, and Ordinary Membership; but the last class of membership has been closed since 1942 and no further elections are made to it. Ordinary members are not eligible for election to membership of the Council or Regional Councils or Branch Committees.

Associateship

Election to Associateship is normally restricted to persons of the full age of 21 years who have passed the final professional examination of the Institute, or until further notice such alternative examination reasonably equivalent in standard as may be accepted by the Council, and have been in approved hospital administrative service for not less than five years.

Fellowship

Election to Fellowship is normally restricted to Associates (or persons eligible for election to Associateship) of the Institute who possess such further qualifications as are required by the Council, including at present a minimum of five years' service in an approved post as a senior administrative officer.

Designatory Letters

Fellows and Associates are respectively entitled to use the designatory letters, F.H.A. and A.H.A., and to describe themselves as Incorporated Hospital Administrators.

Applications for Membership

All applications for election to membership must be made on the prescribed form (obtainable from the Secretary of the Institute) and must be supported by the signatures, as proposer and seconder, of two Fellows of the Institute for election to Fellowship, and of either Fellows or Associates for election to Associateship.

SUBSCRIPTIONS

Annual subscriptions are as follows :—

Fellows	£3	3s.	0d.
Associates	£2	2s.	0d.
Ordinary Members ..	£2	2s.	0d.

The financial year of the Institute runs from 1st October—30th September.

PUBLICATIONS

The Hospital

A copy of the monthly journal The Hospital is supplied gratis to members. The Hospital, incorporating The Hospital Gazette, first published in 1904, and the Journal of the Incorporated Association of Clerks and Stewards of Mental Hospitals, first published in 1913, is devoted primarily to matters of interest to hospital administrators. Regular features include authoritative articles dealing with hospital policy, planning, construction, and administration, including finance, equipment, maintenance, supplies, personnel management, and law, together with reviews of recent books and official publications, and news of hospital activities and developments in this and other countries. Reports of the work of regional hospital boards and such bodies as King Edward's Hospital Fund and the Nuffield Provincial Hospitals Trust are also regularly published, as are a monthly index of official circulars and advertisements of vacant posts.

Although The Hospital is the official organ of the Institute, and as such publishes regular reports of Institute activities, it is the Institute's policy to encourage the free expression of ideas through the journal and to maintain it as a virtually independent as well as authoritative vehicle of opinion and information in the hospital field.

The Hospital may be obtained by non-members of the Institute from the publishers (at 75, Portland Place, London, W.1) or through newsagents; single copies 2s. (post free 2s. 3d.); annual subscription 24s. (post free).

The Hospitals Year Book

The Institute also publishes The Hospitals Year Book incorporating Burdett's Hospitals and Charities, founded in 1889. The Year Book contains articles on various matters affecting the administration of the hospital service and a substantial section of technical and other reference information for hospital administrators. The more important reports and official publications of recent years, which have a continuing relevance to the development and organisation of hospital and allied services are summarised; and also included are a subject index to statutory instruments and Ministry of Health and Department of Health for Scotland memoranda and circulars, a comprehensive guide to hospital purchasing, a directory of Government departments and statutory bodies, hospital directory sections and other features of interest to hospital administrators.

The Hospital Diary

Another publication of the Institute is The Hospital Diary, which is specially designed for the use of administrative, medical, nursing and other officers engaged in hospital and nursing home administration and management.

Other Publications

In addition to the foregoing regular publications, the Institute from time to time publishes reports on matters relating to hospital organisation and administration. Recent publications of this kind include the Report of the Joint Committee on Hospital Accounts and Employment Relations in a Group of Hospitals; A Report of a Survey by the Department of Social Science of the University of Liverpool.

The "Ovaltine" Research Laboratories, where Wander products are constantly under active investigation and development, are amongst the best of their kind, and are staffed by fully qualified scientists.

The "Ovaltine" Factory in a Country Garden, the "Ovaltine" Dairy Farm with its famous herd of Prize-winning Jersey cows, and the "Ovaltine" Egg Farm, are all evidence of the policy of excellence which animates the House of Wander.

The following are a few of the many well-known Wander Products:

OVALTINE

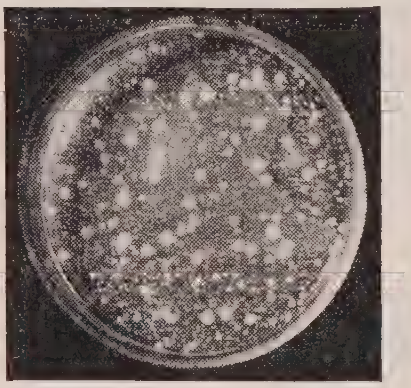
DEOSAN eliminates infection in washing-up water

Look at these photographs reproduced from actual slides

BEFORE TREATMENT WITH DEOSAN



Millions of bacteria found in untreated washing-up water.

AFTER TREATMENT WITH DEOSAN

BEFORE TREATMENT WITH DEOSAN

AFTER TREATMENT WITH DEOSAN

Crockery, glass and cutlery often become infected with dangerous germs during use. You cannot tell when this has happened and even the most careful of ordinary washing-up will not eliminate them. They infect the washing-up water, contaminating other utensils washed in it. The utensils may look clean, but they are still infected and can pass infection to the people who use them next. Your sink is infected, too, by traces of bacteria-laden grease or dirt that cling to it after the water has been drained away. Food poisoning may be caused by such infection. Destroy the invisible enemy which may threaten your good name—

IN YOUR OWN INTERESTS SAFEGUARD HEALTH BY THE DEOSAN METHOD

Five reasons why 58,000 Dunlopillo mattresses have been supplied to British Hospitals

1 They are germ and vermin resistant and make no dust.

2 No repairs or maintenance are needed.

3 The self-ventilating construction eliminates necessity for airing, maintains even mattress temperature and the smooth, no button, form fitting surface discourages bedsores.

4 Permit easier bedmaking — never need turning.

5 Lasting resilience.

Wall's
ICE CREAM

. . . A PURE AND NOURISHING

FOOD FOR THE

HOSPITAL DIETARY

Ice Cream is providing an increasing number of Hospitals with an interesting item on the dietary. It is particularly valuable in providing variation and has the advantage of quick and simple service.

Served by itself or in conjunction with fruit or other puddings it has a psychological as well as nutritive value in the patients' dietary. Many Hospitals also serve Ice Cream to their staff in the Staff Canteen.

Wall's unique organisation of distribution through their local Depots in all parts of Great Britain, thence through the special Refrigerators installed by them in the Hospital, keeps the Ice Cream in perfect hygienic condition.

ELECTRICAR trucks are never idle

Success in any materials handling system is dependent on the use which is made of the equipment. Good materials handling depends on the right equipment being used in the right way. Full utilization of materials handling equipment is far too rare. The best way to ensure that maximum efficiency and output are derived from a materials handling scheme is to consult an I.T.D. technician who will plan a system to suit your particular plant.

For materials handling success consult an I.T.D. specialist

Electrolux Excels in Hygiene

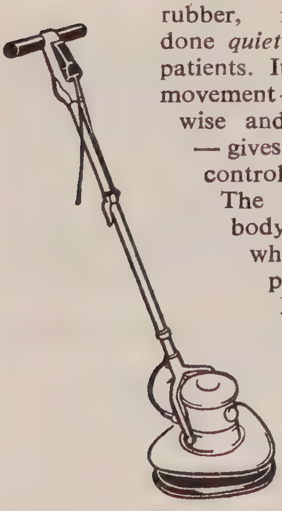
Model 33

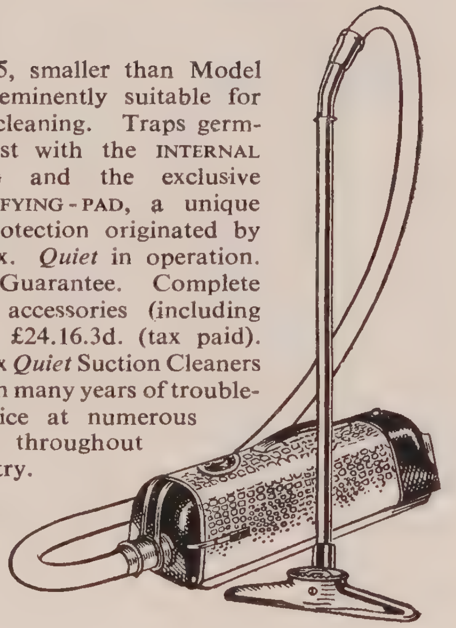
Model 33 is a Heavy Duty Cleaner, designed specially for use in hospitals and other institutions. Capable of dealing with the most onerous of cleaning jobs, it is at the same time easy to handle and operate. Fitted with an internal filter and an Air Purifying Pad to give full hygienic safety. The cleaner's quiet operation will not disturb patients. Guaranteed 2 years. Complete with all accessories : £55 (no tax).

The Electrolux Floor Polisher is invaluable for the speedy polishing of large areas of flooring whether lino, parquet, rubber, marble, etc. — all done quietly without disturbing patients. The polisher's triangular body gets right into corners, while its rubber buffering protects the skirting. Price, including accessories : £24.16.3d. (tax paid).



Floor Polisher

Model 55, smaller than Model 33, yet eminently suitable for hospital cleaning. Traps germ-laden dust with the INTERNAL DUST-BAG and the exclusive AIR-PURIFYING-PAD, a unique double protection originated by Electrolux. Quiet in operation. 2 Year Guarantee. Complete with all accessories (including sprayer) : £24.16.3d. (tax paid). Electrolux Quiet Suction Cleaners have given many years of trouble-free service at numerous hospitals throughout the country.



Model 55

Electrolux Silent Refrigerators are equally suitable for the storage of blood plasma, vaccines and drugs as for the storage of food in Ward Kitchens, etc.

The Electrolux Refrigerator is absolutely silent — by day and night — because it has no moving parts to wear out — no machinery to cause disturbing noises. Operation by Electricity, Gas or Oil. Models from 1½ to 10 cubic feet. Guaranteed two years. Although far more Electrolux Refrigerators are being supplied than in pre-war days, there are still insufficient to meet the unparalleled demand.

As reliable as the Law of Gravity

CHEMICALLY, physically and electrically, Nife-Neverfayle emergency lighting equipment is completely dependable. Chemically, because a Nife battery does not deteriorate during long periods of idleness—the electrolyte is almost inert. Physically, because a Nife Battery is made principally of steel. Electrically, because a Nife battery even after months of inactivity will give its full voltage the moment the automatic switch operates.

For these reasons, and because so very little maintenance is required, over 1,000 hospitals are using Nife-Neverfayle as their protection against lighting failures, whether due to interruption of the supply, or to burning out of the theatre lamp filament.

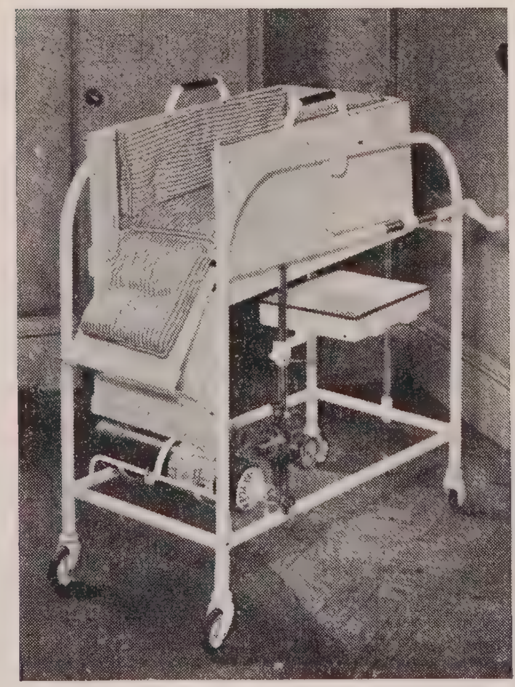
The WILLIAMS Electrically-Heated Cot



Regd. design No. 847108

for

prematurely - born and weakly babies

Primarily designed as a reception cot for use in Labour Wards, the Williams cot is particularly useful where resuscitation coupled with warmth is important.

It dispenses with the additional work and dangers involved in the use of hot-water bottles.

The heating element is thermostatically controlled, so that the temperature of the mattress and the bedding can be maintained at a uniform pre-determined level anywhere within the range of 60-100 degrees F.

"Now if I were Chairman...

FALKIRK

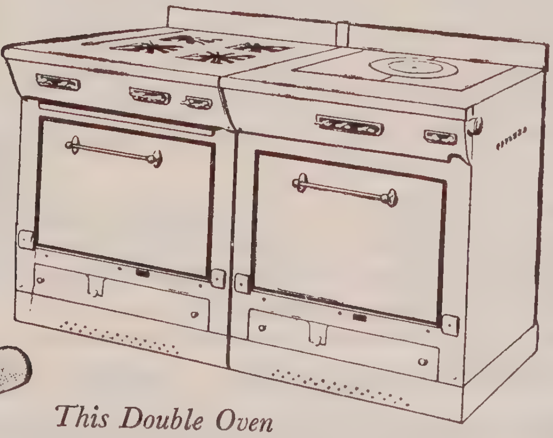
"AN ARMY MARCHES ON ITS STOMACH," said Napoleon. This aphorism still holds in the production battles of today; men and women workers must be well and efficiently fed. 'Falkirk' are the established experts in this field. They make cooking appliances for gas, steam, electricity, solid fuel and oil. These appliances are of robust and most durable construction, the culmination of long years of varied experience.

FALKIRK SERVICE FOR CATERERS

No two catering problems are ever quite the same, whether in canteens, hospitals, restaurants, hotels, clubs or cafés. 'Falkirk' maintain their own staff of experts to prepare individual plans for each type of kitchen. Representatives are stationed throughout Britain to advise, supervise installation, and to inspect and supply free maintenance when the kitchens are finally in use.



This Double Oven 'Falcon' Gas Range of unit construction is a good example of sturdy, practical 'Falkirk' equipment.

Hospital Catering

Hospital authorities to-day appreciate the fact that good feeding is an essential part of good treatment. The importance of a well-balanced diet is well recognised, and the dietitian makes a point of ensuring that the meals provide a sufficient quantity of vitamin containing food.

Marmite has proved to be a particularly convenient natural source of vitamins of the B_2 group. It is easily included in the menu in soups, in meat or savoury dishes, in sandwiches or as a drink. Many hospitals use it in routine catering as well as in restricted diets and it is specially recommended for invalids, for expectant and nursing mothers and for children.

MILO

Dietetic Appreciation

Description of Milo. Milo is a tonic food drink made by Nestlé's. It is the result of prolonged research and the composition was approved by several distinguished dietitians before final adoption.

Ingredients. Milo is prepared in granular form from full-cream milk, malt extract, cocoa, sugar, barley flour and yeast, and is fortified by the addition of phosphates of calcium, sodium and magnesium, magnesium glycerophosphates and vitamin concentrate.

Composition (dry). Fat 10.9%; Protein 13.7% ; Carbohydrates 68.3% ; Mineral Salts 5.1% ; Moisture 2.0%. Minimum content of Vitamin D, 320 I.U's per ounce. Calorific Value, 124 per ounce.

Indications. In normal health, Milo can be taken with pleasure and advantage at all times.

Milo increases calcium-phosphorus intake during pregnancy, thus avoiding depletion of maternal skeleton.

Milo supplies supplementary nourishment during lactation. The mineral and vitamin content helps maintain the health of both mother and infant.

Milo is specially helpful in convalescence and all cases when an easily digested diet is imperative. Its use is conducive to restful sleep.

Milo is especially to be commended in children's diet. Its pleasant flavour encourages the drinking of sufficient milk. Its mineral and vitamin content are invaluable in periods of rapid growth.

Samples of Nestlé's products and literature will gladly be sent on request.

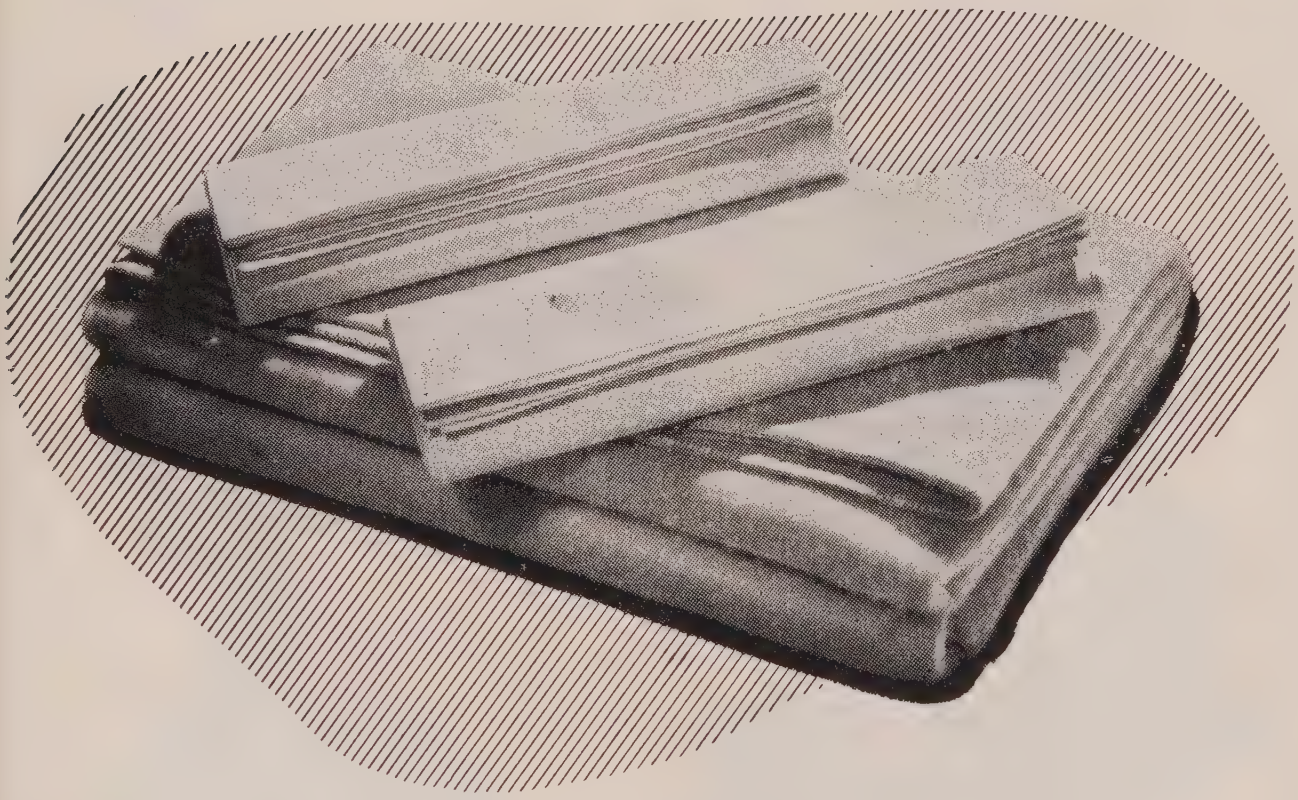
LENSEX

for hospital laundering



Some of its advantages are:

VERSATILITY. LENSEX is an all-purpose, all-temperature detergent—suitable for every requirement of the modern hospital laundry.

WOOLLENS. Excellent results are obtained in one wash. There is no felting of blankets. New blankets keep their soft handle and warm feel.

SHEETS. A break-down and one wash gives pure whiteness and absolute cleanliness.

RINSABILITY. Whatever the classification rinsing is easy with LENSEX. No dulling, unpleasant residues are left in or on the fibres.

STABILITY. Whether in hard or soft water, LENSEX gives satisfactory results. No scumming in hard water means a really clean finish with no risk of lime-soap deposits.

STAFF WASHING. Easy, speedy washing of white coats, nurses' uniforms, overalls, towels and kitchen wear is done with equally effective results.

SHELL LAUNDRY SERVICE. Arrange now for one of the Shell laundry demonstrators to show you the above advantages; keep abreast with modern laundry developments.

the better it looks!

IT is a particular pleasure to the manufacturers that over so long a period Paripan products have been widely used in Hospitals and in other public institutions, where high quality is essential.
Carefully selected and tested materials and skilful manufacture result in products that last unaffected by the process of many years—thus saving the cost of frequent renewals—while the pleasant colours are an enduring delight to the eye.

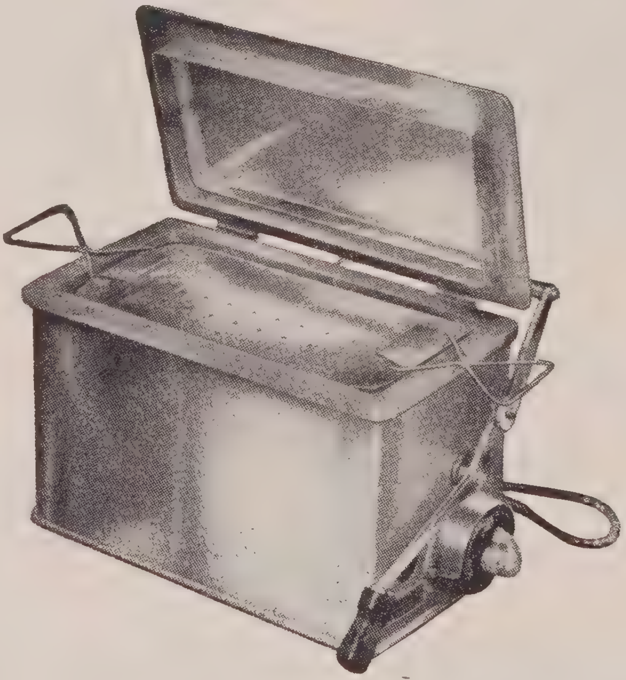
SPECIFICATION

INNER BODY

Made in cast aluminium which ensures uniform heat transmission from the elements to the water, and eliminates the buckles and warpings met with in sheet metal bodies.

OUTER BODY

Made in heavy gauge copper and finished in nickel or chrome plate.



ROTARY SWITCH

This is protected by a drip shield and allows for three regulations of heat. If turned to LOW position at boiling, it will maintain it. This will save current and lengthen the life of the equipment.

AUTOMATIC SWITCH

In the event of water failure this switch will trip the circuit, and can be reset by hand, from the outside. Note—all sterilizers are suitable for A.C. or D.C. currents.

Made in 3 sizes 20″ × 10″ × 7″ 14″ × 6½″ × 5″ 11″ × 5½″ × 4″

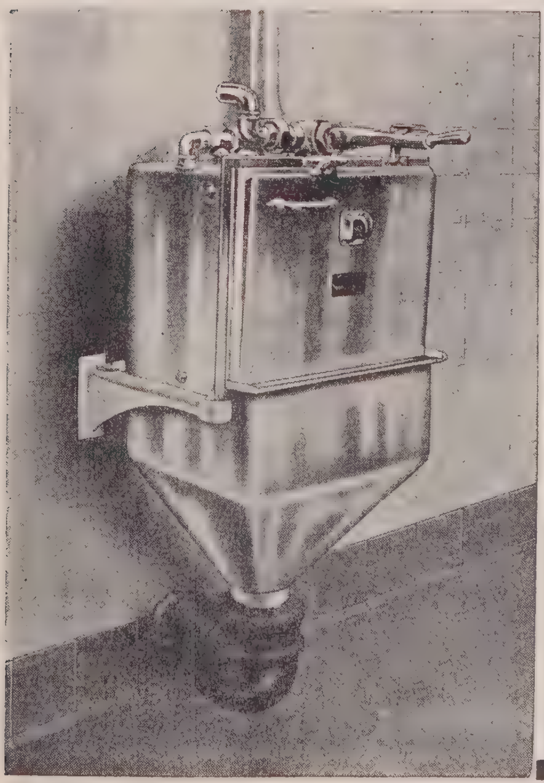
Bed-pan WASHERS



Relatively inexpensive, the B.S.P. "Junior" bed pan washing and sterilizing cabinet has the same high efficiency as the "New" and "Major" models. The rectangular door is self-closing but there is no foot pedal action. Constructed in stainless steel throughout, the cabinet can often be fixed to an existing trap, thus effecting considerable saving in plumbing work.

CALLING ALL UP-TO-DATE HOSPITALS

catering for Children

for babies of 6 months to 3 years

This has superseded the Liberty Bodice, with its innumerable tapes to be tied and untied, which has to be stocked in a variety of sizes.

Note the Advantages:

The light but durable webbing employed weighs only 2½ ozs.
It is instantly operated by the pressure of a couple of hooks.
Has no strings or tapes and is easily rendered asceptic.
Is adjustable so need not be stocked in sizes.
No bib-like front to be soiled by food.
Labour-saving and so invaluable to a minimum staff.

Full particulars may be had from—

The Hospital Harness Supply,
212, Hagden Lane, Watford, Herts.

or a sample may be obtained post free for 2/6d.

Occupational Therapy is a treatment which has only within recent years been used by the medical profession in hospitals.

By means of handicraft requiring varying degrees of attention and skill, occupation helps the patient's escape from the boredom of inactivity and from depression, to improved physical health.

Needlecraft for Occupational Therapy by Penelope was adopted for this purpose in Allied hospitals and Units throughout the World, and was worked by many thousands of Service men and women.

Supplies are still available for the requirements of patients in Service and Civilian hospitals, sanatoria, institutions, etc. Particulars regarding the conditions of supply are obtainable upon application.
